THE RIGHT HONOURABLE WILLIAM CECIL,

LORD BURGHLEY.

CHAP. I.

1573.

THE first public transaction that falls under our notice this year (beginning it in January), is the mission of the Earl of Worcester to Paris, to represent the Queen, at the royal christening, her Majesty having consented to be sponsor to the young Princess, daughter of Charles IX. His Lordship was a Catholic, but so moderate and temperate a one, as to induce the Queen to say of him, as Lloyd reports, "that he had managed to reconcile two things which she had judged to be inconsistent, being a stiff Papist, but a good subject;" so that, to continue in the style of that singular writer, "his Mistress excused his faith, which was Popish, but honoured his faithfulness which was Roman;" and indeed in this mission, she had to lay an odd restraint upon him, which was, not to suffer himself, being her representative, to be drawn in to attend the Mass. To avoid which, however, she had endeavoured to procure the Queen of Navarre to stand in her room, as a Princess well affected to the Protestants.*

Lord Worcester was received with distinguished honours by the French Court, Lord Burghley having particularly prepared them for it, by representing him to Walsingham, to be a Nobleman of great gentleness and thankfulness; adding, that "in very truth he loved him dearly." His religion of course could not fail to be some recommendation, and he was generally numbered among those who as far as was consistent with their duty to Elizabeth, were friendly to the Queen of Scots; but of his devotion as a sworn subject of the former, he gave good proof, on his arrival at Paris, by refusing to hold any intercourse whatever with his own sister, then in that metropolis, till her peace was made with Elizabeth, she having been, as Countess of Northumberland, concerned in the late rebellion.† Lord Worcester carried with him as a baptismal present, a font of pure gold, such as had been given on the Queen's being sponsor to James of Scotland; the Empress and the Duke of Savoy were the other sponsors, and the child, who lived only six years, received the names of Mary Elizabeth.

On his way to France the Earl had been attacked by pirates, who are represented to have been French and Flemish Protestants, jealous of the compliment about to be paid to the French Court.‡ His Lordship indeed had two commissions intrusted to him, being empowered to hold communication with the royal family upon the subject of the marriage with the Duc d'Alençon, as well as to attend the christening.

Upon the troubles happening in France, of which we have given an account under the preceding year, many Protestants fled for refuge to Rochelle; a place capable of defence, and to which end they raised considerable forces in Languedoc; seeming to set their enemies, and even the Government at defiance. And indeed the King was puzzled how to proceed against them, since the Swiss, in resentment of the horrible massacre that had taken place, withdrew their men from the service of France, and would allow of no more recruits to be sent from their cantons; nor were the Germans less scrupulous.* In the mean while the Rochellers took possession of the Isle of Rhe, which afforded them every means of receiving succours by sea, and many English are said to have resorted thither to render their assistance, against which strong remonstrances, as might be expected, were made on the part of the French Court, to Walsingham at Paris. Rochelle possessed many local advantages, as a shelter to the Protestants; the soil around it was so rocky, as to prevent the enemy approaching it by trenches, and while the sea was open to them, it was difficult to reduce the place by famine. It appeared, however, to be a point of such great importance, not to leave this place in the hands of the Protestants, that a regular siege was determined upon, or pretended at least,† under the conduct and command of the King's brother, the Duc d'Anjou, who was to be accompanied by the Duc d'Alençon also; a circumstance of which Walsingham was inclined to take hold, observing to the Queen Mother, that the King's employing the latter thus against those of the religion, might cause him to be less in favour with Elizabeth, and less grateful to her subjects.‡ The Duke, however, was not prevented going, and he wrote from the camp, to the Queen, "loving letters," as Lord Burghley called them.§ He did not indeed advance far in his suit

* "I am glad to hear of the good fortune of the Rochellers, God send it to be true; as also that the King is of no better credit, with the Almains and Switzers."—Leicester to Walsingham, Jan. 29, 1572-3. Compl. Amb. p. 323.

† See Compl. Amb. p. 307. ‡ Ibid. 331.

§ These letters were sent in the month of March, by an agent named Chateauneuf, who having passed through Paris, was supposed to have had in view to prevent any succours going from England to the Rochellers, particularly under the conduct of the Count of Montgomery, a French refugee, supposed to be secretly favoured by Elizabeth. The latter it seems took the opportunity of letting this agent understand, that she was for maintaining the amity if she could, though she was well informed of the French King's evil designs against her, and her kingdom, "when his own troubled causes should come to be settled;" yet she intended that the first breach of the league should be on the King's part, in which case she knew her people to be so willing to "withstand all forces [or foreign, p. 341.] force," that already she could scarcely restrain them from going in numbers to succour the persecuted Protestants at Rochelle, and not only "those of the popular, but Noblemen and Gentlemen of ancient and great livelihoods; who had offered of their own charges to raise an army in Gascony of 20,000 footmen and 2000 horsemen, and for which, in fact, they were quite prepared, but at present restrained, out of respect to the league."—Lord Burghley to Sir Francis Walsingham, March 20, 1572-3. In this letter his Lord-during the present year, the two Courts carrying on the negotiation much after the manner of the former treaty with the Duc d'Anjou, the question of religion continually serving to keep matters in suspense, and now more particularly from what had passed in France ;* to which indeed in this instance was added, on the English part, the notorious disparity of age. But we shall have to notice hereafter, in this Duke's case, some nearer advances towards a marriage than common, upon the occasion of a personal acquaintance between the parties, which Elizabeth seems earnestly to have insisted on, and for which she might be expected to obtain some credit, considering that the disparity of years was likely to tell against herself, were it not for the universal opinion entertained of her personal vanity, and some disparagements which had reached her ear, of the Duke's countenance and appearance; for though Walsingham found many good qualities in him, yet as to his person he doubted. "The Gentleman sure," he writes to Lord Burghley, "is void of any good favour, besides the blemish of the small-pox; now when I weigh the same, with the delicacy of her Majesty's eye, and considering also that there are some about her in credit, who in respect of their particular interests, having neither regard unto her Majesty, nor to the preservation of our country from ruin, will rather increase the misliking of him by defacing of him, than by dutifully laying before her the necessity of her marriage, &c." In the last passage there can be little doubt of an allusion to Leicester, who, notwithstanding all possible professions to the contrary, had been nearly hurried into excesses, while the former treaty was on foot, for marriage with the Duc d'Anjou. However, on which side there was least of sincerity, it might be difficult to decide: Elizabeth's shufflings and indecisions on all such occasions are well known; and as to the views of the French Court, Walsingham in the very letter just cited, writes, "Whether this marriage be sincerely meant or no, is a hard point to judge, where dissimulation taketh so deep root."

It was not long after the writing of this letter, that Walsingham was recalled from his laborious and hazardous embassy to the French Court, with which he had great reason to be disgusted, and some months after his return, made Secretary of State, to the satisfaction no doubt of Lord Burghley, who had now two Secretaries whom he could so much trust, and of whose talents, as statesmen, in those most difficult times, it is impossible to doubt. Walsingham, it is true, has a hard name, with those who contemn all underhand dealings, the employment of spies, interception of letters, &c. &c.* But in his vindication we have only to look to the manners of the age, in which, it is not too much to say, there could be found no security but by over-reaching the crafty, confounding the intriguing, preventing the plotters in secret, and stripping the mask from the hypocrites. We must again revert to what we have so often said, that dangers averted come in time to be accounted no dangers, and that the successful watchman is scarcely credited for having put to flight thieves or murderers, or prevented any intended depredations. Fortunately, however, for the credit of Elizabeth's wise and vigilant protectors, we have the self-acknowledgments of many of that age, in foreign Courts, that deceit and dissimulation were at all times the fixed principles of their policy; at all events, with regard to Sir Francis, we have rather an extraordinary testimony to produce, that his efforts were patriotic, and that whatever he did, was for the security of his Sovereign and his country, to his own great loss. In the Anonymous Life of Sir Philip Sidney, prefixed to his celebrated romance of the Arcadia, we have this account of him: Sir Philip, it should be observed, married his daughter, and as she was portionless, has the credit given him of "not carrying his love in his purse," but of having chosen the lady for her intrinsically rich, but unendowed virtues; and speaking of her father, he adds, "this is that Sir Francis, who impoverished himself to enrich the state, and indeed made England his heir; and was so far from building up a fortune, by the benefit of his place, that he demolished that fine estate left him by his ancestors, to purchase dear intelligence from all parts of Christendom. He had a key to unlock the Pope's cabinet; and as if master of some invisible whispering place, all the secrets of Christian Princes met at his closet. Wonder not then if he bequeathed no great wealth to his daughter, being privately interred in the quire of St. Paul's, as much indebted to his creditors, though not so much as our nation is indebted to his memory." Mr. d'Israeli has reasonably enough introduced this passage into his paper, on "Palaces built by Ministers," in the second series of his Curiosities of Literature.

ship reiterates his strong apprehensions of such "imminent perils to the state," and "danger to the crown," unless her Majesty marry; that speaking of the negotiations with the Duc d'Alençon, he says, "I do force myself to pursue it with desire."—Compl. Ambass. p. 336. Of the particular part he took in it, a proof may be seen in the two papers following, in French, pp. 337, 338. purporting to be the Queen's answer to the French Ambassador, Le Motte Fenelon, par Mons. Le Grand Tresorier, March 18, 1573.

The King's army did not meet with much success at first in the siege carrying on against Rochelle. Victuals were scarce, and some eminent persons were killed, particularly two, the Duke d'Aumale and Schaviger, whose deaths were regarded as a judgment upon them, for having been the chiefest executors of the late horrible massacre at Paris. The Queen, however, would not grant any help from England to the Rochellers, for fear of violating the treaty of Blois. There is a particular account of the place, and of the efforts of the besiegers, to be seen in a letter from Dr. Dale, the successor of Walsingham at the French Court, in the Appendix to the second volume of Strype's Annals, No. xxvii. The Rochellers defended themselves admirably against the besieging army, and in the month of July, were relieved by a pacification brought about, in a great measure, by the interposition of Elizabeth; the Protestants were allowed the free exercise of their religion, and it was stipulated that no garrison should be kept in Rochelle. This, however, proved not to be agreeable to many about the Court, nor was the army satisfied; so much otherwise indeed, that the Duc d'Anjou who commanded it, and was now become King elect of Poland, was induced to retire from the Camp almost by stealth.

The election of this Prince to the vacant throne of Poland, was perhaps one of the most extraordinary transactions of the times; an anxiety seemed to prevail in the French Court, to remove both the King's brothers to a distance. The King was jealous of Henry, and the Queen Mother had regard it seems to a prophecy, which foretold that all her sons should be kings; but as Charles was not strong, and Henry was her favourite, she wished the Duc d'Alençon to be absent also, that in case of the King's death, he might have no advantage over his brother. The Duc d'Anjou might have gone to England or Scotland, as well as the Duc d'Alençon, could he have been fixed in either of these kingdoms; but as things stood, he was to be sent, it seems, as far off as to Poland, and his election to be secured against a host of competitors, or at the least, against a number of adverse votes. The task of managing this difficult election, was consigned to a person of whom we have before had occasion to speak, the celebrated Bishop of Valence, M. de Montluc, as subtle a Statesman as any then in existence, and who had already appeared in sixteen embassies in Italy, Germany, England, Scotland, and Constantinople. It has been conjectured, that his diplomatic abilities were never exposed to a greater trial, or a severer test, than upon this occasion. The story may be read in a work just cited, Mr. d'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature; the account being chiefly drawn from the "Discours" of Choisnin the Bishop's Secretary.

"There was one scene in this Drama" [an Elective Monarchy], says that entertaining writer, "which might appear somewhat too large for an ordinary theatre; the actors apparently were not less than fifty to a hundred thousand. Twelve vast tents were raised, on an extensive plain; a hundred thousand horses were in the environs—and Palatines and Castellans, the ecclesiastical orders, with the Ambassadors of the royal competitors, all agitated by the ceaseless motion of different factions during the six weeks of the election, were assembled at the diet."

The election however of Henri d'Anjou, was to many persons and states so obnoxious, that he had some difficulty to find even a practicable road to his new dominions. He is said to have been denied a passage through some parts of the Continent, and endeavouring to pass by sea, the jealousy of England was aroused;* especially as his application to do so, through the French Ambassador, happened to coincide so exactly with some applications made by the same Minister, for the removal of the Queen of Scots to Buxton, as to excite no small suspicions of a confederacy for sinister purposes—as permission was asked for his fleet to take shelter, upon any emergency, in the ports of England. We have indeed one account to produce, of a very complicated plot against England at this time; but the intelligence appears to have passed through so many hands, as to render the substance of it very doubtful; we shall give it in the words of Strype, as deduced from documents still extant.

"A plot was this summer carrying on, by the foreign Princes addicted to the Papacy, to invade England; and first, the King of Poland under pretence of preparing a navy for Poland, was therewith suddenly to seize some port in England; and at the same time the Scots, persuaded by the Cardinal of Lorrain, were to break into England with a very great army, made up of French and Scots; and then on another side, the navy of the Spaniards and that of the French together, were to seize another haven of the kingdom; at which time Duke d'Alva, with the aid of the Bishop of Colen, and other Bishops, and the Duke of Bavaria, with 10,000 foot, intended, on the side of Flanders, to wage war with the Queen; and for the carrying on this war the more successfully, the Pope, the King of Spain, the aforesaid Bishops, and all the Popish States of France, were now consulting together; and the Cardinal of Lorrain intending the kingdom for his niece the Queen of Scots, of which he was very confident, promised for one year to provide payment for 30,000 men; as soon as the nation was thus invaded, great numbers of Roman Catholics, the Queen's subjects, were to rise."—All this was signified in discourse at the baths of Aguisgrane, by an English lord, to a certain French lord there, named De la Tour.—The whole of this communication may be read in the Appendix to Strype's Parker, No. xci.

We cannot pretend to say who excited the alarms in the breast of Elizabeth, that seem at this time to have existed, but we are happy to be able to acquit Lord Burghley of all participation in them, as far as regarded the Queen of Scots. He urged the Queen to allow Mary to pass to Buxton, telling her, "That if in very deed that Queen's sickness were to be removed by a resort to those wells, her Majesty in honour could not deny her to have the remedy thereof;"* being ready besides to answer for Lord Shrewsbury's care of his charge, whatever plots might be in agitation.

The Duc d'Anjou, therefore, was allowed to pass by sea to Poland, and Mary went to Buxton for the recovery of her health; and here it was that she actually received a visit from Lord Burghley himself, ill health appearing to carry him to Buxton exactly at the same time; and his great intimacy with Lord Shrewsbury, bringing him naturally into contact with his unfortunate prisoner. We cannot pretend to say what passed upon this occasion, but advantages were taken at Court of this accidental meeting. There were those at hand with the Queen, prepared to insinuate, that the Lord Treasurer was inclining to take the part of Mary against the Queen; and in consequence of these insinuations, it became necessary for him to leave the place. It is impossible for us to draw any other conclusion from these premises, than that Lord Burghley was no such inveterate enemy to Mary, as to be free from the suspicions of those who were enemies to both; that this was really the case we have, however, a much stronger proof, inasmuch as these very jealousies and suspicions, were the ostensible reasons for Lord Burghley's declining a proffered alliance with Lord Shrewsbury's family; an alliance, certainly not to be upon any slight motives declined by a new Peer, though so great a man. But as this relates rather to the year 1575, we shall pass by it for the present.

Great fears, however, seem to have been entertained at this time of the Scottish Queen's escape.—And the Earl of Shrewsbury was not free from imputations of carelessness, or over-much indulgence to his charge. Mary suspected Leicester of being her great enemy, and though he repelled such charges and insinuations in a letter to Lord Shrewsbury, yet it is extremely probable, that he took pains to render all other persons suspected, who put themselves into his power, by shewing her any particular attentions; which seems particularly to have been the case with Lord Burghley. His absence from Court afforded Leicester an opportunity of depreciating him in the eyes of his Sovereign, by mischievous insinuations; while his accidental repair to Buxton, gave, if we may so say, a locality to those insinuations, by fixing Elizabeth's attention on his probable intercourse with Mary, through Lord Shrewsbury; the accusation was the more formidable at this time, because the Queen had intimation given her of a remarkable confederacy of Popish Princes abroad, to rescue Mary, and set her on the throne of England: "Devouring the kingdom of England," as Strype expresses it, in favour of the Queen of Scots.*

The Puritans were very troublesome this year, and Lord Burghley could not avoid, as in former instances, the being appealed to by both parties, chiefly on the part of the Puritans, by Dering, and Sampson the deposed Dean of Christ Church, now master of the hospital of Leicester;† a situation procured for him by Lord Burghley himself, in consideration of his great learning. He had been seized with a fit of the palsy, which did not however prevent his writing (or dictating) a particular letter to the Lord Treasurer, the substance whereof may be seen in Strype, in which he professes a conformity in doctrine to the Established Church, but is very anxious for a stricter discipline.

Dering's application to the Lord Treasurer was much more particular, entering largely into all the circumstances of the case, objecting principally to the lordship and civil government of the Bishops; for some time, it is reported,

* See the report of De La Tour, a French Nobleman, Bochart, a French Gentleman, and Bromfield, an English Gentleman, from the Spaw, August 11, 1573.—Strype's Annals, ii. 376, 7.

† In the government of this hospital, he acquired great credit; having been instrumental, besides, in rescuing its estates and property from the rapacity of the Concealers, in which, says Strype, he was assisted by "the good Lord Burghley;" in allusion to which, Sampson tells his Lordship in one of his letters, "All the poor there prayed for him, and he with them, that God would bless his honour." How much the Lord Treasurer set his face against these Concealers, may be seen in Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, xxi., where their practices are well exposed. —He even procured the Queen to revoke their commission by proclamation, and make them restore what they had wrongfully taken.

he hesitated whether he should address his letter to Lord Leicester or Lord Burghley; the former was a sure friend, upon motives we need not at present discuss; the latter could only be chosen in preference, as eminently disposed to give a patient hearing to whatever might be advanced on either side; his chief object being peace and quietness, if it had been possible to reconcile two parties so opposite; but he was not for encouraging any disobedience to the laws.

Collier has inserted, as much as has been preserved of a long speech delivered in the Star Chamber by the Lord Treasurer, and at the Queen's command, to press the execution of the laws, particularly the uniformity statute; and as it seems decidedly to acquit his Lordship of all partiality towards the Precisian Non-conformists, of which he has been accused, we cannot avoid repeating some passages of it; the Treasurer, says Collier, acquaints the Lords of the Star Chamber, that, "Her Majesty was informed, that through the negligence of the Bishops and governing Clergy, several persons underqualified in age, and unfurnished with learning and discretion, have been admitted to cure of souls, and trusted with the desk and pulpit. That these men for want of ballast and maturity have struck out into singularities, governed themselves by their own fancies, set the Rubric aside, and made alterations in the offices of the Church; and thus, neither the prayers are read, nor the Sacraments administered according to public order; thus by the mischief both of precept and example, they have misled their audience, brought them to dislike and censure of the ecclesiastical Government, and made them believe they cannot comply with the ceremonies established, without disserving their conscience; that this latitude must be destructive to Government, and that her Majesty cannot discharge the trust lodged with her by Almighty God, without providing a remedy for this evil. That her Majesty cannot satisfy her conscience without prosecuting these disorders, and doing her utmost to bring practice and law together: neither does she think those subjects worthy of favour and protection that abet these innovations; and either directly or indirectly countenance the alteration of any thing settled in the Church. That her Majesty is apprehensive, the long connivance at these pernicious doctrines, the countenance and commendation given them by some persons in public stations, both of the Clergy and Laity, may probably have made way for propagating the mistake upon certain persons of figure in the country, who may be apt to fancy these innovating doctrines, these refinings upon the ceremonies of the Church, are not so destructive as her Majesty believes them; that the points are little more than matter for argument and problem, and that the practice either way is in a manner indifferent; and, it may be some people may go farther, and imagine these Novellists in the right, and that their exceptions against the ceremonies of the Church are reasonable and well-founded. Now if any persons lay under a mis-persuasion of this kind, the Queen commanded him to dilate farther upon the case, and make good her apprehensions of the danger. He observes, therefore, that nothing is more obvious to those who have any idea of government, any taste of conduct, than that contempt of order must pull all in pieces and prove fatal in the issue. If a man has but a family to manage, or a vessel to steer, there is no good to be done without submission to the person at the helm. For if the subordination be once broken, if orders be disputed, if he that is to govern commands one thing, and those under his charge quarrel the directions, and demur in their obedience; if they set up new schemes of their own, what can follow but jarring and confusion? And if, as it sometimes happens, they disagree among themselves, contend for their own singularities, and run into farther subdivisions, the mischief must increase and grow more troublesome when the union is thus broken, when authority is lost, and all the respects of public and private confounded, what a condition must any society be in? Which way can either the head or the body be preserved, upon such wild measures? Can the Governor maintain his post, and continue his situation without being obeyed? or can the subject subsist in a Government where every one runs counter to the public rule, and sets up a different direction? and if this liberty looks ill in language and description, how lamentable must it be when brought into life, and reduced to practice? By this clashing between the father and the children, between the master and the servants, between the captain and the crew, many rich ships go to the bottom, many estates are spent, and families brought to nothing; and thus by a private image, and by comparing small things with great, they might collect the calamity of a nation, where the harmony was disturbed, and the Government disregarded; and if disorder and squabbling about temporal matters may destroy the public interest to so remarkable a degree, what may be expected where conscience is concerned, where Religion lies at stake, and the other world is brought into the quarrel?"—But to return to the case we were more immediately discussing.

Dering addressed himself to Lord Burghley as an accused person (for he had been removed from his Lectureship), and his appeal to him was grounded on the injunction of St. Paul, "Receive no accusation against a preacher without good and sufficient witness." "I know, my Lord," he writes, "you will not do it, and I have good evidence of your equity in this behalf; and because I will not appear to be led by fancy, wherein of a great many I am thought to be singular; I will be bold with you, as the man, whom, above others of your calling, I am bound to honour, to shew forth what is my opinion, and the reasons by which I am moved unto it." Most of his objections to the Episcopal Government of the Church, are evidently directed against the Popish Government by Bishops, of which he wished no similitude, as it would seem, to remain. "And so I beseech you, my good Lord," he writes, "while God hath taken away a courage from Princes, that they have suffered such a servant to sit in the monarchy of the world: hath not God recompensed the thraldom of their hearts upon their own heads, and made only a proud Pope to tread them down all in dishonour? and in several reigns also, the Popish prelacy hath shamed their Princes, and sometimes raised up such rebellions, as have cost their Kings both crown and life." And speaking of Episcopacy generally, or such an order in the Church as Bishops; he says, "It is of the Pope, and it shall drink of the same cup of confusion. Where is this Lordship in the greatest honour, but where the Pope's Holiness is set highest? Where is it abated, but where the Pope's head is broken? And where is it rejected, but where the Pope is trodden under feet?" He does not indeed deny a primitive order of Bishops, but by his comparisons, and making no allowance for a difference of times, and states of society, plainly objects to the order as suffered to remain in a reformed Church. The whole of this long letter may be seen also in Strype [Annals, b. i. ch. xxviii. vol. ii.],* and may serve to shew the spirit and reasonings of the party, which at this time, in endeavouring "to break the Pope's head," and ignominiously "tread him under foot," gave great disturbance to the Church,† and great advantage to the Papists themselves, who were by nothing more comforted and encouraged, than by these sad differences among those, who were equally bent upon withdrawing themselves from the power of the Pope; hoping, that the little prospect

† The Genevians, as Gualter of Zurich called them, were not singular in disturbing the Church of England. "God has adorned that Church [of Geneva], with divers excellent gifts and the ministers thereof; but yet I would wish them, 'modestius et humilius sapere,' and not seek to draw their shoe on every man's foot. The Genevians do still endeavour to thrust their discipline upon all Churches; they suggest their arguments and counsels not only to you Englishmen, but in like sort to the Germans, Phrysians, Polonians, and Hungarians; whereby, among those that agreed well before, rixæ et turbæ enascuntur, brawlings and quarrels do arise."

there might seem to be of reducing things to an uniformity, under a regal supremacy,* would induce the Queen herself, in course of time, to re-admit the spiritual supremacy of the Roman Pontiff. The Privy Council, amidst all these disturbances, though not inactive in endeavouring to preserve the peace in Church and State, by some prosecutions and frequent warnings and admonitions, yet were judged by the Archbishop and Bishop of London, to neglect too much, at so critical a time, to advise with the Bishops [See their joint letter to some absent Bishop in Strype's Life of Parker, vol. ii. 280, 281.]; while the Puritans, not content with asserting their opinions at home, in derogation of the established order of things, were continually appealing to the foreign Reformed Churches, where indeed there were many able and excellent men,† but whose interference (though they generally lamented and often blamed the contentious spirit of the appellants),‡ could scarcely fail to raise jealousies; the independence of the English Reformed Church being one of its first principles. In the mean while it deserves to be recorded of those who had the chief rule at this time, that a great distinction was made between peaceable Non-conformists and those that endeavoured the overthrow of Church and State: that the one were indulged, while the other were restrained.§ How much restraint some needed, may be judged from the case of Birchett, a Gentleman of the Middle Temple, a furious

* The Queen, in June of this year, issued a proclamation (which may be seen in Strype's Life of Parker, ii. 256.) directed against the books and practices of the Puritans, and strongly inveighing against their contempt and breach of the laws, which were intended to promote "one uniform, godly, and quiet order within her realms." The proclamation, however, had but little effect.

† The following lines by Bishop Parkhurst to his friend Cole, a learned man at Oxford, contains so many names, and bespeaks so largely that Bishop's gratitude for favours conferred on him while an exile in Mary's time, that they deserve to be transcribed.

"De Bullingero, Bibliandro, Martyre, Zancho, Et Gualthero, Gesnero, de Pelicano,
Nostrum judicium si forsan, Cole, requiris;
Hos Ego doctrina eximios, pietate gravesque,
Judico, queis similes perpaucos hic habet orbis."

His description of Zurich, while he sojourned there, "Urbs, e qua pulsa est Venus, Ate, pulsus Iacchus," is also curious, as an historical monument.

‡ It may be observed that the Clergy of Zurich, such as Bullinger, Gualter, &c. were far from approving the conduct of those who were for forcing the discipline of Geneva upon other Churches; as if Geneva were to be accounted the "oracle of Christendom." zealot, who had taken it into his head that it was lawful to kill such as opposed their endeavours to bring in their model and discipline, and in the extremity of his zeal, slew by mistake a captain of the royal navy whom he took for Mr. Hatton. This act of fanaticism appeared so alarming, that the Queen was for having him tried and executed in a summary manner, and by martial law; and a commission was actually drawn, on the suggestion, as it was by some mistake alleged, of Lord Leicester and the Lord Admiral, which so hurt the latter, that wishing to have the aid of Lord Burghley, who was not then with the Court, he wrote to him in the greatest haste, even while he was at dinner, the Queen also seeming to wish to have his judgment upon it. It is to the credit of that noble Lord that he soon turned her Majesty aside from the design of having him executed in such haste, though unfortunately it had an ill effect in the end, as by deferring to proceed against him, it gave him the opportunity of committing another sad murder, by killing his keeper. Such, however, was the infatuation of this deluded fanatic, and it seemed to accord in no slight degree with the general spirit of his party, which was too apt to represent the opponents of the Genevan discipline, as the direct enemies of God and the Gospel. "Their colour is sincerity," (they are the words of Archbishop Parker and Bishop Sandys)* "under the countenance of simplicity: but in very truth they are ambitious spirits and can abide no superiority."† "In the platform set down by these new builders, we evidently see the spoliation of the patrimony of Christ, and a popular state to be sought; the end will be ruin to religion, and confusion to our country." "Neither do they only cut down the ecclesiastical state, but give a great push at the civil policy." "Their fancies," say these reverend Prelates, "are favoured of some of great calling, who seek to gain by other mens' losses." This indeed was very much the case, especially with Lord Leicester, as is very generally known; nor has Lord Burghley altogether escaped the im-

* It is remarkable that the expressions used by these learned Prelates are by no means stronger than the terms applied to the Puritans by certain of the divines at Zurich: "I would to God," says Bullinger, "there were not in the authors of this Presbytery lubido dominandi, an ambitious desire of rule and principality." "I understand," says Gualter, "that those turbulent innovators have gone so far, that under the plausible title of good order and discipline, they desire the whole government and policy of the Church of England to be utterly overthrown."

† Speaking of Cartwright's Admonition to the Parliament, the Archbishop in defence of himself, who was personally attacked in it, says, "Howsoever he (Cartwright) disliketh the act of throats-cutting, or of breaking mens' necks, he delighteth to apply both terms to Archbishops and Bishops." P. 90. sect. 4. p. 70. sect. 3.

putation, through his moderation, and sometimes acting with the Privy Council, under an apparent neglect of the Bishops, as has been intimated before.* But he seems in no instance to have turned a deaf ear to the complaints or remonstrances of the Episcopal Bench; on the contrary, he appears to have wished for a Convocation to be summoned, and to sit, for the express purpose of considering what was best to be done, to keep the people steady to the Church as established by law; for thus Bishop Sandys wrote to him† at a time that the Puritans were most busy: "The Convocation of the Clergy, to convince or reject these new mysteries, is well-minded of your Lordship; it is the thing that I have sundry times remembered, and oftentimes desired, for otherwise the people can hardly be satisfied. I humbly pray your Lordship to be a means unto her Majesty that a national Council may be called, wherein these matters now in question may be thoroughly debated: and that concluded, and by her Majesty confirmed, which may most tend to the true serving of God, and the good ordering of this Church of England. If your Lordship travel herein, you shall travel in God's cause, and for the quiet of this Church; and the sooner the better, for it is time to cut off these troubles."

From the above letter, we may form some judgment of the arduous task imposed upon the Lord Treasurer as a layman, to decide between so many different appellants, calling upon him to take their part as equally active and zealous, in what they mutually called "God's cause;" for the Puritans made greater pretence of this than any others. Their cause, they constantly assumed to be, in exclusion of all others, the cause of God and the Gospel. And of the exclusive claims of the Papists, as the members of an infallible Church, there could be

* See the Bishop of Ely's letter to the Lord Treasurer, Strype's Parker, ii. 266. He refers him to the two following passages, one ancient and the other modern, as good authorities in the case; "Quotius de religione agitur, Episcopos convenit agitare;" which is a sentence in an edict of Arcadius and Honorius; and which is cited from Bullinger, the pious minister of Zurich (then living); "Sacerdotum proprium est officium, de religione ex verbo Dei constituere. Principum autem est, juvare sacerdotes, et provehere et tueri veram religionem." These passages were adduced in censure of the Privy Council, for having passed a judgment on Dering's answers, without consulting spiritual men. It must be observed, that Dering had told the Bishop of London, that at his last appearance in the Star-Chamber, all the Council favoured him, except the Lord Treasurer.—Strype's Parker, ii. 270. Dering on one occasion had grossly misrepresented the Bishop to Lord Burghley.—See Ibid. 271.

† Lord Burghley seems sometimes to have pressed hardly upon the Bishops, in too freely quartering upon them the foreigners who resorted to England for protection.—See Strype's Parker, b. v. ch. xxii. vol. ii.

no doubt. Between all these, Lord Burghley seems to have kept on his course, with singular moderation and prudence. Though a layman indeed, he had, in cases where he chose to rely upon his own judgment, no slight knowledge of the questions in dispute between the parties, but he was not for deciding any thing when appealed to, if, with greater propriety, he could refer the case to others.* He seemed, therefore, constantly to be chosen, as a medium of communication with the Queen, with the Bishops, with the Privy Council, with the heads of the Universities, as well as with those who, by any circumstances, had rendered themselves amenable to the authority of any of those public magistrates.—We need not stop to produce proofs of this, for the proofs are still extant in their original shape and character, if any should choose to inspect them with their own eyes; the greatest difficulty to us has been, to make a selection out of documents absolutely innumerable.†

We have now to speak of the Queen's Progress in the summer of this year, which was confined chiefly to the county of Kent and its borders. First, however, it may be well to notice a letter from the Court, in which the Lord Treasurer and some of his family are so particularly spoken of, as not to be passed by in a work like the present; otherwise, there is perhaps no document of those times better known. It is the letter of Gilbert Talbot, to his father the Earl of Shrewsbury, No. lxxxiv. in the 2d vol. of the Illustrations of British History. We cannot transcribe the whole, as it is too long; but, as descriptive of the Court in this very year (May 9, 1573) it is certainly curious. "I have thought good to advertise your Lordship, of the estate of some here at the Court, as near as I have learned by my daily experience. My Lord Treasurer, even after the old manner, dealeth with matters of the State only, and

* See an instance of his concern upon such an occasion, and his great caution.—Strype's Parker, ii. 278, 279.

† The following remark by Mr. Ellis, in his admirable publication of Original Letters, considering his situation as head librarian of that surprising repository of ancient documents, the British Museum, is too important and of too great authority to be passed over; considering what we have already often intimated of Lord Burghley's incessant and multifarious occupations.

"The unceasing employ of Sir William Cecil's mind, while Secretary of State, can only be known to those, whose researches lead them to the documents of his time. From the question of peace or war, down to a regulation for the lining of a slop-hose [alluding to a former paper]; from quarrels at Court, to the bickering between a schoolmaster and his scholar; from the arrest of a Peer, to the punishment of a cut-purse; all was reported to him, and by all parties in turn, was his favour craved."—Vol. ii. 2d Series, p. 311.

beareth himself very uprightly; my Lord Leicester is very much with her Majesty, and she sheweth the same great good affection to him that she was wont. Of late, he hath endeavoured to please her more than heretofore; there are two sisters now in the Court, that are very far in love with him, as they have been long; my Lady Sheffield, and Frances Howard,* they (of like striving who shall love him better) are at great wars together, and the Queen thinketh not well of them, and not the better of him; by this means there is spies over him. My Lord of Sussex goeth with the tide, and helpeth to back others, but his own credit is sober, considering his estate; he is very diligent in his office, and taketh great pains. My Lord of Oxford is lately grown into great credit; for the Queen's Majesty delighteth more in his personage, and his dancing, and valiantness, than any other. I think Sussex doth back him all that he can;† if it were not for his fickle head, he would pass any of them shortly. My Lady Burghley, unwisely, hath declared herself, as it were, jealous,‡ which is come to the Queen's ear; whereat she hath been not a little offended with her, but now she is reconciled again. At all these love matters my Lord Treasurer winketh, and will not meddle any way. Hatton§ is sick still, it is thought he will very hardly recover his disease—the Queen goeth almost every day, to see how he doth."

About two months after the writing of the above letter, her Majesty began her Progress. She had before, in the month of March, paid the Archbishop a visit at Lambeth, and been, with her whole Court, most sumptuously entertained there, at his sole expense; and now in July she began her summer progress with another visit to his Grace, at his house in Croydon; where she staid seven days, with all her attendants. On the 21st, her Majesty removed to Orpington, the seat of Sir Perceval Hart, Grantee of the Manor; here also her Majesty was magnificently entertained, and so delighted with some fanciful and allegorical representations got up to amuse her, that she gave a new name to the house, calling it Bark Hart; the last, in compliment to the owner, and the former, because a ship and a sea-conflict had been among the sights exhibited.‖

* Daughters of William, Lord Howard, of Effingham; the Earl of Leicester married the former, and the latter became Countess of Hertford.

† Out of spite, probably, to Leicester.

‖ The house which now belongs to Sir Thomas Dyke, Bart. is said in Nichols, still to bear the name so given to it.

She staid three days at Orpington, and thence went to her own palace at Knowle, adjoining to Sevenoaks, where she continued five days; from Knowle, she went to Birlingham, or Birling, an ancient seat of the Nevilles, but then the residence of Lord Burgavennie (Abergavenny) and continued three days; proceeding next to Mayfield, on a visit to Sir Thomas Gresham; and from thence, to another seat of Lord Burgavennie, Eridge, in Waterdown Forest, where her Majesty abode six days. And from Eridge she passed to Bedgbury, in the parish of Goudhurst, a seat of the Colepeppers; here her Majesty stayed one day only, and proceeded to Hemsted in the parish of Benenden, belonging to Mr. Guilford, where she passed three days. A letter which Lord Burghley wrote to the Earl of Shrewsbury from Hemsted, dated from the Court at Mr. Guilford's house in Kent, Aug. 10. is still preserved; in it his Lordship writes, "The Queen's Majesty has had a hard beginning of a progress in the weald of Kent; and namely, in some part of Sussex; where surely, are more wondrous rocks and vallies, and much worse ground, than in the Peak. Now we are bending to Rye, and so afterwards to Dover, where we shall have amends."*

But her Majesty by no means took the shortest road to Dover; for from Rye, where she remained three days, she came back to Sissinghurst, the seat of Mr. Baker, in the parish of Cranbrook, where she staid three days; and from thence, to Boughton Malherb, Mr. Wotton's; her next journey being to Hothfield, Mr. Tufton's, where she spent two days, some of her Court being entertained at Surrenden, the seat of the Derings. This was on the 20th of August, and from a MS. account book of one of the family (Richard Dering, Esq.), it appears that Lord Burghley was one of the number. "Mem. That the 20th day of August, anno 1573, when her Majesty in her progress, lay at Mr. Tufton's,

* The chief purport of this letter, is concerning the Queen of Scots going to Buxton for her health; Lord Burghley appearing to have just gained the Queen's permission for her removal, the letter being written by command. "I am now commanded to write to your Lordship by her Majesty, that she is pleased, that if your Lordship shall think you may without peril, conduct the Queen of Scots to the well of Buxton, according to her most earnest desire, your Lordship shall so do."—"And this I write, because her Majesty was very unwilling she should go thither." The reasons are stated; which, it seems, with the help of the French Ambassador, during the visit to Lord Abergavenny at Eridge, he had overcome; but he adds, That the Ambassador having just at the same time, asked for admission into our ports, of the ships of the Duc d'Anjou, on his way to his new kingdom of Poland, gave occasion to some about the Queen, to be jealous of Mary's journey to Buxton.

there lay in my house Sir William Cecil, Knight, Lord Burghley, Lord Treasurer of England and his wife; the Lady Paget, and Mr. Carye her husband; Mr. Edward Fitzgaret, Lieutenant of the Pensioners, with divers of their retinues."

"From Hothfield the Queen went to one of her own houses, Westenhanger, the keeper whereof was Lord Buckhurst, and there she continued four days; and from thence took her departure for Dover, dining at Sandown Castle in her way. On Folkstone down, or cliff, she was met by the Archbishop, with a large company of Knights and gentry of the county, by whom she was conducted to Dover, amidst the ringing of bells, and the roaring of heavy ordnance."*

Lord Cobham was then Constable of the Castle, and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. At Dover she remained six days, taking next, in the course of her progress, the ancient town of Sandwich, where great honours were paid her; the particulars of which may be seen in Nichols. From Sandwich she went to Wingham, on her way to Canterbury; where she arrived in great state, being lodged at the old palace of St. Augustine,† and entertained by the Archbishop, in a style of great magnificence and prelatical hospitality; for the particulars of which we must refer to other writers, who have treated expressly of these things.‡ But as far as regards Lord Burghley, a constant attendant upon her Majesty, and to whom, indeed, all the preparations for her Majesty's recep-

Here Charles I. and his Queen Henrietta, lodged on the day of their marriage; and Charles II. on his passage through the city at the Restoration.

D. 1573. [Lansd. MSS. No. 16. Art. 52.] As to his Lordship's treatment of the Queen's suite, which Mr. Ellis thinks was not always what they expected, it should be considered, that Theobalds was not originally calculated for such receptions; and that her Majesty went oftener there, than any where else.—As the letters, however, that seem to complain of the receptions at Theobalds, were addressed to Mr. Hickes, Lord Burghley's Secretary, it is possible that the meaning may have been misinterpreted; perhaps they might only express, for Mr. Hickes's information, the apprehension, that Theobalds could not escape the trouble and expense of a fresh visit.

tion had been submitted by the Archbishop, we have to record rather an unpleasant circumstance that befel him, while within the precincts of the Cathedral; for here he received a "most venomous book, written by some Papist against him and the Lord Keeper;" not the first of the kind he had received, but coming to his hands at such a time, it could not but be expected that he would feel it severely. He was lodged in one of the prebendal houses, from whence he could not help writing to the Archbishop, though so nigh to him, to express his resentment of so malicious an attack of his character, as well as upon the character of his near friend and relative, the Lord Keeper; his note is dated, from "My lodgings at Mr. Percon's,* 11 September, 1573," and is to this effect:

"May it please your Grace,

"You shall see how dangerously I serve in this State, and how my Lord Keeper also in my respect, is with me beaten with a viperous generation of traiterous Papists, and I fear of some domestic hidden scorpion. If God and our consciences were not our defence and consolation, against these pestilential darts, we might well be weary of our lives. I pray your Grace read the book, or so much as you list, as soon as you may, and then return it surely to me; so as also I may know your opinion thereof. When your Grace hath done with this, I have also a second smaller, appointed to follow this; as though we were not killed with the first, and therefore new assault is given; but I will rest myself upon the Psalmist's verse, 'Expecta Dominum, viriliter age, et confortetur cor tuum, et sustine Dominum'—

"Your Grace's at commandment, W. Burghley."

To which the Archbishop returning the book gave answer, describing the malice of it; and like a true friend, and grave divine, comforted the good Lord Treasurer in these words:

"I return your Lordship your mad book again; it is so outrageously penned, that malice made him blind. I judge it not worth an answer; some things were better put up in silence than much stirred in. Your conscience shall be your testimony to Almighty God. It is no new matter for such as take pains for the good governance of the commonwealth to be railed on. In my opinion they be very comfortable words which be uttered by our Saviour Christ, who once shall be our Judge, Beati estis cum probra jacerint in vos homines, et dixerint omne malum adversus vos, mentientes, et propter me, gaudete et exultate; sic enim persecuti sunt Prophetas qui fuerunt ante vos. In these and like words, I for myself repose my heart in quietness: beseeching Almighty God with his Holy Spirit to comfort your mind in these blasts of these devilish scorpions. Conscia mens recti mendacium videt, &c. "Your assured in Christ, M. C."

* As several of the Court were of necessity obliged to find their lodgings distinct from her Majesty's residence, many of the prebendaries, as Strype relates, after the Archbishop's own words, strove for the honour of receiving the Lord Treasurer. See his Life of Parker, ii. 294.

We may surely perceive in these letters, a great sense of injured innocence on the part of Lord Burghley, and a great confirmation of his just resentment of such malicious slanders, on the part of the Archbishop; and we may very fairly draw this conclusion, that in allusion to the beginning of Lord Burghley's letter, it was on many accounts, "very dangerously," that he served the state, in such strange, critical, and important times.

The Lord Treasurer had always been a lover of antiquities, even from his first entrance at Gray's Inn, in the year 1541, as is particularly recorded of him. The Archbishop seems to have remembered this circumstance, and to have sought to indulge his taste at this particular time, by sending to him many books, of that credit and character; some especially that related to the county of Kent; "that the Queen," as it is stated, "who would be inquisitive concerning the places where she journeyed, might have the more satisfaction given her by the said Treasurer, who was near her person, and whom she was known to look upon as a man of special learning and knowledge of the history and antiquities of her kingdom, and so would be most apt to put her questions to him." Lambard's Topographical Discourse of Kent was therefore sent to him, though as yet only in manuscript; and another book entitled "A Discourse of Dover," with which, upon perusal, the Lord Treasurer found great faults, and therefore sent it back to be corrected.

The Archbishop gave the Treasurer, however, some other books, more appertaining to his office, than to the Kentish progress; as particularly a manuscript of Gervasius Tilberiensis, sometime a Treasurer of the Exchequer, an author whom Lambard supposed to have flourished in the reign of Henry II.* His Grace also was careful at this time, to present to the same noble and learned

* Gervaise of Tilbury, was, in fact, a nephew of King Henry II. Nicholson, in his historical library, calls him "that famous Exchequer man, King Henry the Second's nephew, Gervase of Tilbury; who besides the Black Book, is said to have written a large historical commentary upon Jeoffrey of Monmouth, under the title of Illustrationes Galfredi, which he dedicated to the Emperor Otho IV."

Lord, his own book, entitled Antiquitates Britannicæ, of which a very particular account may be seen in Strype's Life of that excellent Metropolitan, b. 4. c. xxiii. The full title of the work was as follows: "De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ; et Privilegiis Ecclesiæ Cantuariensis; cum Archiepiscopis ejusdem LXX. Historia." The Archbishop assured the Treasurer, that he had not given copies of this work to so many as four men in the whole realm.* It was, indeed, printed in 1572, but kept back, and the Archbishop seems to have doubted whether it would ever be openly presented to the public, leaving it in a great measure to the private judgment of his Lordship, "peradventure, it shall never come to sight abroad, though some men, smelling of the printing of it, are very desirous cravers of the same; I am content to refer it wholly to your Lordship's judgment, whether it shall stand or fall." It would seem that in the title-page the lives of seventy Archbishops were promised; but the Archbishop himself was the seventieth, and yet his life does not appear, though written, as it is conjectured, and ready for printing under the title of Matthæus.† The Archbishop's Secretary Joselyn, is supposed to have had a great share in the work, and probably was the sole author of Matthæus.

The Queen staid fourteen days at Canterbury, then proceeded to Faversham for two days, to Sittingbourn, Tunstall, and Rochester, where she abode four days, for the purpose, it has been conjectured, of more narrowly inspecting the work going on in her Dock Yards at Chatham, having the year before issued orders for the increase of her Navy.‡ From Rochester she passed to Cobham Hall, the seat of Lord Cobham, then Lord Lieutenant of the county; from thence to Dartford, and finally returned to her palace at Greenwich; having made, as it were, a complete circuit of the county of Kent.

"Lord Cobham, gave her two cups of gold, and Lady Cobham a tankard of alabaster, garnished with silver and gilt.

"Mr. Colepeper at Bedgebury, gave her a chrystal cup garnished with silver and gilt, and a tuft of flowers at the top.

"Mr. Guildeford at Hemsted, a bowl of silver and gilt, with the Queen's arms and supporters on the cover.

On the 9th of June this year died the celebrated William Maitland, who, even as Mr. Chalmers admits, "was not second to any Statesman, during an age of talents." Of the particular circumstances attending his death we shall have more perhaps to say hereafter, when we bring down the history of Scotland to the period of which we are speaking.

Before we entirely turn our back on the year 1573, it may not be amiss, perhaps, to take some notice of the following passages in Mr. Ellis's very interesting collection of Original Letters, from MSS. in the British Museum—though we must anticipate a good deal in bringing the facts together, and some, indeed, we must leave for future consideration. In his first series of Letters, vol. iii. No. ccxxxi. Mr. Ellis has printed one from Henry Bossevyle to Lord Burghley from Calais, concerning a medicine for the gout, A.D. 1592,† which he introduces with the following remarks:

"The gout of a Prime Minister, must in any country, and at any time, have been an object of fixed attention with physicians: and in no time more, perhaps, than when Lord Burghley was Lord Treasurer of England. His Lordship was greatly afflicted with the gout: and people, even in remote countries, and of the highest consideration, used their utmost efforts to effect his cure. Among the Lansdowne MSS. there are letters to Lord Burghley from all parts of Europe, in English, in Latin, in Italian, presenting him with nostrums of the most infallible characters."

How early in life the disease attacked Lord Burghley does not appear; but a Mr. Dyon writes to him with a course of physic and diet as early as Jan. 24, 1573, the outside of which is marked in Lord Burghley's hand, *Recipe pro podagrâ. The Lady Harrington sent his Lordship some other directions, Feb. 4, 1573.† We have an Italian letter to him concerning a powder for the gout, dated Dec. 12, 1575.‡ In 1579, a prescription was sent to his Lordship in Latin, by Dr. Henry Landwer, to ease his gout by medicated slippers:§ previous to which, a variety of remedies had been sent to him in Latin by Dr. Hector, selected from the works of Averroes, Johannes Anglicus, and Mattheus Gradensis.‖ In 1583, another Latin letter came from one Nicholas Gybberd, who pretended he had found a tincture of gold to cure the gout:¶ and in 1584, an Italian letter with a pressing offer of cure of another kind, from one Signor Camillo Cardoini.

In 1592, one Henry Bossevyle wrote (as above)†† from Calais, offering for a few hundred pounds and a piece of preferment to furnish his Lordship with some plaisters, which, from the description, it might strongly be feared would have proved more painful to the patient than the gout itself. Lastly, the Earl of Shrewsbury‡‡ begged his Lordship, in 1593, to make trial of the oil of stag's blood, which he said, with a rare and great virtue, had been serviceable to himself.

Having before had occasion to notice several instances of sickness and bad health, to which Lord Burghley was subject, we shall only observe at present, that he certainly appears to have been visited by the gout long before the year 1573; and that he scarcely seems to have suffered any attack of pain or illness without receiving some nostrum or other from the hands of friends or strangers. Among the Lansdowne MSS. we also remember to have met with several; particularly one from Lord Abergavenny, in 1584, consisting of a pot of balm, and a cere-cloth for a pain in the shoulder. In the very next year we shall have occasion to speak of his friend Sir Thomas Smith's attempts to cure both his Lordship and one of his daughters.

Sixteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, began November 17, 1573.

If we might trust to the report of Rapin, as to the events of this year, the reader would have little to expect from us, and our own labours would be very trifling; for thus he delivers his opinion of the total want of materials for any history of our domestic occurrences: "Nothing memorable passed in England during the year 1574." We wish, for the reader's sake, as well as our own, that this statement were at all true, as regards the subject of this Memoir; but it is certainly far otherwise: Lord Burghley had much upon his hands—by an act of lenity to the Papists, he gave great offence to the Puritans at home; while, by his continual watchfulness over the practices of the emissaries of Rome, he exposed himself so much to the resentment of the Papistical party abroad, as, according to some accounts, narrowly to have escaped assassination before the year was passed. The Queen, the Bishops, and the Privy Council, were at variance upon some important points of Church discipline; and the Lord Treasurer, as usual, was the referee of all parties. "We come now," says Strype, "to look upon those dangerous enemies, both of the Church and the Kingdom, the Papists.

"The State was so unwilling to inflict the rigour of the laws against them (so I will say, rather than indeed favourable to them), that it set at liberty this year divers of them, as yet detained in prison.

"But the setting these men at liberty gave great disgust to many, as being judged a matter of very dangerous consequence; their very principles leading them into practice against religion and the Queen's life; and it was reported commonly, that the Lord Treasurer's gentleness had been the cause of this counsel."

It having been a matter of perfect impossibility at that time, to take any such step, with the consent of all parties, or indeed with any safety, we must not wonder that the Lord Treasurer was soon checked in the course he was judged to be pursuing, by remonstrances, cautions, and no slight instances of blame.

The first address of this nature, indeed, appears to have been from an Archbishop, and certainly not without some ground of reason; some parts of the kingdom being undoubtedly more in danger from Papists than others, and particularly the Northern parts, where the seeds of the late rebellion were likely enough to start into life again upon any favourable concurrence of circumstances. The rumour of what was taking place in the South, imboldened those therefore, who were in confinement in the North, to demand, as of right, their own release, presuming the indulgence to be general; but the Archbishop of York, upon their petition, or rather claim, being presented to the Council there, judged it expedient immediately to write to the Lord Treasurer, intimating that "if such a general jubilee should be put in use there, a great relapse would soon follow after in those parts."*

But the remonstrances of the Puritans were of a less confined nature, and more alarming, if the grounds thereof had been perfectly true. For in a letter from as considerable a person amongst them as any, and one as well known to Lord Burghley himself, we mean the ex-Dean of Christ Church, Sampson, the lenity shewn to some of these unfortunate prisoners, is charged upon the noble Lord, as an actual favouring, nay justification of their cause; for in one passage of this letter, he fairly tells his Lordship, that "if he received them as men to be pitied and helped by him, for the cause of their imprisonment, and therefore worthy of his favour and friendship, view well," said he, "what you do; you do justify their wicked cause; you cannot be friendly to them, but you must become a friend to popery. In which doing, what is it that you can promise yourself? is it heaven? is it God's favour? nay, truly; for they are all the enemies of God, enemies to his truth and gospel."

* In the beginning of the year this Archbishop [Grindal] had particularly reported to the Lord Treasurer, that things were quiet in those parts, he might therefore be the more afraid of any accidental disturbance. "We are in good quietness," his Grace wrote, "God be thanked, both for the civil and ecclesiastical state." He had, indeed, by his care and good judgment, much diminished the number of disaffected Papists there; and in what he wrote to the Lord Treasurer, he had authority to use the Lord President's name, as well as his own, whose care also he highly commends.—The letter itself may be seen in Strype's Life of Grindal, Appendix, No. iii.

Thus we see how difficult a course this great statesman had to steer, when he had to counsel or to countenance, any particular acts of lenity. For we may find from history, that upon any endeavour to lessen the fall, or abate the losses of those, who by interfering too far with the established order of the Church, incurred the forfeiture of any ecclesiastical preferment, or situations in the Universities (as had been the case with Sampson himself), he became equally liable to the charge, or suspicion, of favouring Puritanism, and being unfriendly to the hierarchy; though we shall find him in this very year appealed to, by one of the Episcopal Bench, as the very person, "by whom the Church of England had hitherto been defended;" by another, as "the common asylum, nay, unicum fere asylum (almost the only asylum), of the Bishops and Clergy;" and by a third, as him, "in whom, under God and my Prince, is my only trust and stay." When we consider these things, and how patiently he bore the suspicions of his friends, though highly resentful of the false and malicious accusations of his enemies; we may well conclude, that, as his Domestic writes of him, "All the envy of his enemies had its spring rather from his good deserts, than any just cause of dislike; and the chiefest ground of men's grudgings, was the original of his praises; drawing enmity upon him, not for any private benefit to himself, but for the service of his Prince, the love of his country, and his justice to the subjects."

We have spoken of the remonstrances of his friends, upon certain and particular occasions; but we have two instances to adduce, of the malice of his enemies at this time; which had they succeeded to the extent imputed to them, might have greatly abridged his public services.

The account of the first plot of this kind we shall take from Collier, as he appears to enter into all the circumstances, as far as they were generally known, and we have no occasion to enlarge farther upon it, as it is not free from doubts and difficulties. "About a month forward,* a plot was discovered upon the Archbishop, and the Lord Treasurer Burghley, and some other Courtiers of distinction. The design was, to have taken them off by poison or some other way. It was charged upon some Puritans, who are said to have engaged upon zeal and motives of conscience. One of the principal confederates was one Undertree, who communicated the enterprise to the Archbishop's steward, and offered him a bribe, to join in the attempt and destroy his master; the steward seeming to close with the proposal, discovered the villany to the Archbishop; Parker acquainted the Lord Treasurer with the detail,† advised him to search the matter to the bottom, to prosecute the conspirators, and reward the informer; and that unless justice was exerted in an exemplary manner, neither his Lordship, nor the Queen herself, could be long safe; that he believed these assassins were countenanced underhand at Court, and that some who lay in the Queen's bosom,‡ as he expresses himself, would sting her when opportunity served.

"When Undertree was seized and brought before the Privy Council, the practice had somewhat of the face of a sham-plot; for several Puritans' hands had been counterfeited by this Undertree. In short, this man, upon his examination, denied having any accomplices, and took the whole matter upon himself. This made the Archbishop expect further danger; that Undertree had been tampered with, encouraged to give false evidence, and insured against prosecution; for he thought it improbable, this assassin should engage in so desperate a practice of his own fancy.

"The Earl of Leicester, as has been observed, appeared at the head of the Puritan party, and seemed very active to bring the Archbishop into disfavour with the Queen, and make him insignificant. Parker, in a letter to the Lord Treasurer, complains of this usage, mentions the Earl's being unquiet, and that he practised with the Precisians to undo him; that he cared not for him, but should pay him a regard, because her Majesty had been pleased to distinguish his person, and put him in a post of honour; that these Puritans and their abettors, struck at the Treasurer no less than himself, and that therefore his Lordship was concerned to guard in time, and look out for a defence."

We have given this story exactly as we have found it in Collier, more for the sake of shewing that Lord Burghley was reputed to be opposed to Leicester, in the great question of the Puritans, than to make much of the plot itself. It would seem that the worthy Archbishop, made more of it than the Lord Treasurer, who appears to have been sorry, that he had been taught to apprise the Queen of a great conspiracy, when in the end so little evidence could be produced of one, and even that so suspicious.* Collier himself, indeed, who would not have spared the Puritans, had it turned out much against them, seems rather to make light of it.

But the worthy Archbishop had certainly in the course of this year, almost the last of his life, great cause given him of vexation and uneasiness, on account of the Puritans, and some of their "underhand friends at Court."

In order to promote a more diligent and critical study of the Scriptures, on the part of the ministers of the Church, the scheme of prophesying (as it was called after the fashion of the Jewish teachers, and in the sense of St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv.), had been introduced into several dioceses, and sanctioned by the Bishops thereof. On certain days, particular texts of Scripture were discussed in the Churches, in the way of disputation, as well to try the abilities of the disputants, as to fix the true sense of the Scriptures; and to avoid all improper wrangling, or intemperate controversy, a Moderator was appointed to keep things in order, and arbitrate between the parties.† It must have been impossible not to see that such meetings, though ever so well designed, were open to abuse; or likely, at the least, to hinder rather than promote, that uniformity which the Queen wished, and the laws enjoined. And this soon turned out to be the case; a learned ministry was undoubtedly much wanted; but learning at this time happened to be a good deal on the side of the Non-Conformists; those who were come back from the school of Geneva, and were absolutely bent upon introducing, if they possibly could, a service, a ministry, and a scheme of ecclesiastical discipline, totally different from those established by the law, and stamped with the Queen's authority. Many of the Bishops had been refugees, and imbibed abroad certain principles, not entirely accordant with those of the Church establishment, though by no means so discordant as to interfere with the duties of their office. In fact, some had, indeed, been in the way of observing the course of the Reformation in Switzerland; but there was a great difference, as we have before had occasion to observe, between the Churches of Zurich and Geneva; the zeal of the latter, in short, was much more fierce and unaccommodating than the former.* The Pastors of Zurich, were for the the most part honest, worthy, and good people, and though fully as sincere as those of Geneva, in their opposition to the corruptions of the Church of Rome, as learned, and as well acquainted with the Scriptures, yet they were more friendly to a conformity in matters of indifference, and much less inclined to force their opinions upon others. They could well allow of the English Episcopacy, of King Edward's Reformation, and consequently of the Queen's Reformation, which was, in fact, but a return to the former; but the Genevans had a platform or Reformation of their own, which they must have known to be incompatible with what had been established, and to the overthrow of which they must consequently have been always looking; while the spoliation of Church property, which had hitherto kept pace with the Reformation, procured for them friends at Court, who possibly looked only to that part of their system. Leicester, at least (who might be considered on some accounts as a host in himself), was undoubtedly chiefly actuated by such principles, though there was no want of religious professions, and a show of zeal, for the other part of their system.

But in the course of this very year, things seem to have been brought to a most extraordinary crisis. In the diocese of Norwich particularly, the prophesyings having been reported to have led to some abuses, on the question of conformity, the Queen gave her commands to the Archbishop, to have them put down, not only there, but generally throughout his province; and this happened in the very beginning of the year, when some of the Bishops were written to, but the Bishop of Norwich particularly. And yet in May, the Bishop (Parkhurst) received a letter signed by no less persons than Grindal, then Bishop of London, and three Privy Counsellors, Sir Francis Knowles, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State, highly commending those exercises, and advising that they should not be stayed or hindered; with a reserve, however, that nothing contrary to the laws established, no seditious, hypocritical, or schismatical doctrines should be taught or maintained. The Bishop, however, complied with the Archbishop's injunctions, and the exercises were put down; but this was only the beginning of a struggle long kept up, and of which we shall have but too much occasion to speak hereafter; the Lord Treasurer being placed too near the Queen to be exempt from the perplexities and difficulties continually arising out of this much agitated question and point of discipline.*

* We have an instance of this in the strong expressions of Beza in his Reveille Matin, published this year at Edinburgh; in which he takes an opportunity of blaming Elizabeth for suffering Mary of Scots to live. "What clemency is that," he exclaims, "which draws with it the ruin of so fine a state, and of religion also? Is it not the greatest cruelty? After her [Elizabeth's] decease, if things remain as they are, there is no way to hinder the Queen of Scots from succeeding, and then the kingdom will be turned upside down, and the religion changed; all those who will not be so wicked as to abandon their religion, will then at least be banished, as under the former Mary; when Elizabeth was lately unwell, many already then began, a trousser leurs quilles." He then enters largely into the reasons why Mary ought to suffer, and endeavours to refute the arguments against her punishment. See him cited by Mr. Turner, ii. 290. But we must do Beza the justice to add, that in our own country, the alarm of the French massacre led very good men among ourselves, to think with him, that should Elizabeth fall a sacrifice to Mary's friends and adherents, similar scenes might take place even in England. See our account of the year 1572, and particularly our reference to the Bishop of London's letter to Lord Burghley, in Mr. Ellis's Second Series. The Bishop's letter, however, was written at the very moment of the panic.

Though Lord Burghley, as we have shewn, had incurred some blame, for his lenity towards certain of the Papists this year, he had always his eye upon the proceedings of those, who might be supposed to be practising against the Queen's Majesty, and the repose of the kingdom. The defeat of the Northern rebellion had driven many abroad, where he had good reason to know, they were not likely to be quiet, if not carefully looked after; the very rebellion in which they had been engaged, recommending them to the notice of the Popish states on the Continent, not merely as sufferers, but as disaffected persons, who might be of use to forward or assist some of the practices, constantly on foot, openly or covertly, to promote the great change they contemplated, of the overthrow of Elizabeth, and with her of the Protestant Church of England. And in the course of this year, his Lordship had a remarkable return made to him, of such refugees, as had become actual pensioners of the King of Spain, though rebels to the Queen, and the greater part of whom had been sent to Flanders, to be under the eye and possibly assistant to the Duke of Alva. The names of these persons, from the very papers still in existence, indorsed by Lord Burghley, may be seen in Strype. [Annals, ii. 495. and Appendix, No. xl.] The amount of the pensions paid by the King of Spain to these exiles, was ascertained to be a sum yearly of two hundred and thirty-one thousand ducats!

* See in Ellis's Original Letters, 2d Series, vol. iii. No. cxcvi. [MS. Lansdowne, 17 art. 27 Orig.] a letter from the Bishop of Peterborough to Lord Burghley upon the state of his diocese, and the unruliness of the Puritans in it.

But his watchfulness and care of the Queen, against the machinations of her foreign enemies, had, by all accounts, like to have cost him dear, for we are informed, that a plot this year was in agitation, "to poison the Queen's great and able statesman, the Lord Treasurer;" that an Italian had undertaken to manage it for a large sum of money, to raise which, it appeared, Sir Francis Englefield, then at Brussels, and an active Popish refugee, had been consulted; but the thing transpired through the accidental discovery of a private letter, still to be seen, thus endorsed by the hand of the Lord Treasurer himself. "Ult. Novembris 1574. a copy of a letter found in Bridges [Bruges in Flanders], by one Allyn a Merchant, concerning the practice to poison the Lord Burghley." The letter is copied by Strype.

The Queen herself seems to have fallen under some extraordinary apprehensions about this time, which depressed her spirits, and made her more careful than usual; for upon occasion of her summer Progress, which commenced in June, she appears to have been unwilling, in quitting the metropolis this time, to carry the efficient members of her Court with her as heretofore; so that the Lord Keeper, Secretary Walsingham, Sir Ralph Sadler, Chancellor of the Exchequer,* and even the Lord Treasurer himself, were bidden to tarry in London. In the preceding month, when she had projected a visit to the Archbishop at Croydon, it appears from the preparations made by Bowyer, Usher of the Black Rod, the Lord Treasurer was expected to have accompanied her.† This visit however was deferred.

Before her Progress, that is, towards the latter end of May, her Majesty appears to have passed six days in retirement, at Havering Bower; of her intention to do so, Lord Shrewsbury's son gave him the following intimation in a letter, dated May 10.

"Here is nothing but of King Philip coming down into Flanders; and preparing the Queen's navy to sea.—The Queen's Majesty goeth on Saturday come sennight, to Havering of the Bower, and there remaineth till she begins her Progress, which is to Bristol."

Elizabeth seems to have had a particular desire to visit that city, otherwise

* So in Strype, but Query, Sir Walter Mildmay?

† Nichols, i. 385.—N.B. This is the same Bowyer who so greatly displeased Lord Leicester, by refusing admittance into the Privy Chamber, to one of his Lordship's followers; but who, having the courage immediately to appeal to the Queen, procured such a reprimand to Leicester, as he was little accustomed to, but which is too well known to be repeated.

many judged it to be too long a journey for her; thither, however, she went in the month of August, and was received with great ceremony.*

Lord Burghley seems to have suffered some uneasiness this year, on account of his son-in-law, Lord Oxford; who, having a cause or suit, that came before the Queen, was not so favourably answered as he expected, but rather reproved by her Majesty for his unthriftiness; which the impetuosity of his temper induced him, perhaps, to resent, for he fell into some disgrace.† The Lord Chamberlain was careful to inform Lord Burghley of it, who wrote of him as favourably as he could, but appears to have been very apprehensive of his being moved, by some of his young friends, to be guilty of farther indiscretions.—This, however, was but the beginning of troubles in that quarter.‡

* See, for an account of this visit, Nichols, i. 393. taken from Churchyard's narrative.

† In Howard's Collection of Letters are two; one from Lord Burghley, and the other from Lady Oxford at this time, which are rather curious.—They are both addressed to Lord Sussex; the former we transcribe:

"My dear Lord,—I heartily thank you for your gentle remembrance of my daughter of Oxingford; who as I think meaneth, as her duty is, to wait on her Majesty at Rychmond, except my Lord her husband, shall otherwise direct her; and so I take my leave,

"From Mrs. Tins, "Your Lordship's assuredly, W. Burghley."

this 27th of June, 1574."

The following is subjoined by the Editor—

N.B. There is nothing worth public inspection in this letter, but the care which this great man seems to have taken of his daughter's education, with regard to matrimonial obedience.—This woman of quality was to be directed by her husband.

It might have been added, even in regard to her duties to be discharged at Court.—For Lord Sussex was Chamberlain, and Lady Oxford's own letter to him from Theobalds is, to request him to assign her proper apartments, while on duty at Hampton Court; and she concludes with saying, "The more commodious my lodging is, the willinger, I hope, my Lord my husband will be to come thither, thereby the oftener to attend her Majesty."

‡ Lady Oxford, "the Lord Treasurer's beloved daughter," as Strype calls her very justly, appears to have suffered also this year from sickness, to her father's great grief. Sir Thomas Smith, who amidst a great variety of learning is said to have understood physic well (which for those times might perhaps be the case), prescribed to her, with the sanction of Lord Burghley, a remedy of his own; of the effect we are not told, but Strype, who records the transaction in his life of the Secretary, seems to have entertained a great opinion of his skill; though one of the proofs he adduces, about an ague which afflicted the Lord Treasurer himself, is in our present improved state of physic and knowledge of diseases, almost laughable; the Secretary, it seems, had told the Lord Treasurer, that "he trusted it was but diaria, coming of a sudden obstruction in the pores of the skin, by cold, that which in a rare body and tenderly kept, must needs be; till either by evaporation or sweat, the same be opened again." Of the Secretary's skill in chemistry, we have

Cox, Bishop of Ely, a very old acquaintance of the Lord Treasurer, fell into some difficulties this year, and felt thereby obliged to address himself to the latter upon the occasion, "as to his dearest friend on earth;" which are his very words.—It seems unfortunately to have been the case, that even some of those who were friendly to Episcopacy, not properly weighing the Bishops' great charges, fancied them to be rich when they were really not so; and it must be acknowledged, that the Lord Treasurer was not altogether free from such suspicions. This Bishop, it seems, was required to give up his Episcopal house in Holborn, to Sir Christopher Hatton, and the Lord Treasurer was the writer of a letter to him for this purpose; which the Bishop, under a very proper feeling that he was but an usufructary or temporary steward of the property belonging to the See, declined to do, and appealed to the Treasurer's known consideration for the Clergy, to stand his friend upon the occasion.

Other Bishops, as Scory of Hereford, and Barkley of Bath and Wells, Herle also, Warden of Manchester College, appealed to him, in the course of this year, as the "common asylum," and "common patron of Religion and Learning," to interfere in cases, well described by Strype, and to whose account of matters, therefore, we may reasonably refer; as it does not appertain to this history, to enter into the exact particulars of such addresses, farther than to shew how great a friend to the Church, this celebrated Statesman was reputed to be.

Parkhurst, Bishop of Norwich, of whom we have had much occasion to speak, died this year; he had been domestic chaplain to Katherine, Duchess of Suffolk [of whom see our first volume, p. 646.] and to Queen Katherine Parr, and tutor at Oxford, to Bishop Jewel; but in Queen Mary's time, he forsook the kingdom a curious instance in Strype's Annals, ii. b. i. ch. xxxiii. and in which, indeed, the Lord Treasurer and Lord Leicester appear to have had an equal concern, according to the fashion of those times; it was not quite so fanciful a conceit as, "the Grand Operation," or "Philosopher's Stone," but was founded on the transmutation of metals, which in those days was little better, as to any real knowledge of the physical properties of bodies.—Of the great imperfection indeed of such knowledge, before Lord Burghley's illustrious relative, Lord Bacon, had opened the way to true experimental inquiry, we can have no greater proofs than in the propensity of some of the wisest men of those days, Lord Burghley among the number, to give entertainment to the fanciful conceits of Alchymists, Astrologers, &c.; of which, in the course of the year 1574, some curious instances occurred, as in the case above; and in the application of John Dee to the Lord Treasurer; an account of which may be seen in the place already referred to, and whose proposals were founded on the Sympathia et antipathia rerum, a fact in nature certainly, but in those days no better than the foundation of all strange projects and fallacious undertakings.

and repaired to Zurich, where he was not only hospitably received, but so kindly entertained and friendly entreated, by the worthy Pastors and learned men of the place, as to make an impression on his susceptible and grateful mind, never to be effaced; he maintained the son of Gualter, with whom he had lodged at Zurich, at the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford (for he was a member of both), entirely at his own expense; and by his particular desire, as a testimony of his grateful remembrance of what had passed; and never omitted any opportunity of requiting the friendship shewn to him by many in that place. The remembrance indeed of what he saw there, is supposed to have inclined him to wish for a simpler form of Church government than he found established at home on his return, and to favour the Puritans; but he never omitted, upon any check, to submit to the injunctions of his superiors, and the authority of the law. His great and cordial friends at Court, says Strype, were Sir WILLIAM CECIL, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Dr. Thomas Wylson. The praises bestowed upon him by the celebrated author just cited, do him the highest credit, as a man of learning, an earnest Protestant, a lover of sincere religion, an excellent Bishop, and a faithful Pastor.

We have to record also, as having taken place this year, the death of a person of an inferior calling, but of no small eminence in his line, Reginald Wolf, a very skilful printer, and a learned and good man; he enjoyed the favour and countenance of Lord Burghley, Archbishop Parker, and the good Bishop of Norwich, of whom we have just spoken, who was accustomed to style him "Bibliopolarum Londinensium Flos." He was not merely a printer, but a collector of rare and curious tracts, which he had designed to apply to the forming and publication of a Universal Cosmography. Of these collections, which Wolf himself did not live to arrange and apply as he intended, Hollinshed made great use (with the consent and approbation of Wolf himself), in his History of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Having brought the history of our domestic affairs down to the conclusion of the year 1574, it remains to say something of Scotland and the state of things abroad.

We have already noticed, under the year 1572, that the Parisian massacre had a natural tendency to weaken or divide the Queen's party in Scotland, and in the same degree to strengthen that of the King and the Protestant Regency; and this without Killegrew's assistance, who, like other English Ministers, lies under the usual imputation of being sent on a pretence of conciliating the two parties, but, in fact, to keep them divided and disunited. At this time, however, the Queen (Elizabeth) had every motive to wish to have them united, the common tendency of things being towards the strengthening the Protestant interest. Morton, therefore, and Killegrew, entered into negotiations to this effect, and prevailed so far, as to bring over even the Duke of Chatelherault, and the Earls of Huntley and Argyle, so that nothing seemed to remain to oppose the views of the Regent, but the Castle of Edinburgh, which still held out under Grange and his party; upon the submission, however, or accession of the Duke, Huntley, and Argyle, to the King's party,* Grange began to treat with the Regent upon the footing of a former negotiation with the Earl of Mar, and offered in the end to surrender in six months. But Morton had such good intelligence of what was passing abroad, as too well to understand the drift of this delay; he knew that Grange had been secretly encouraged to expect great help from abroad, and that if he did not prevent his purposes, by speedily compelling him to surrender, foreign forces might be introduced into the kingdom, and all that depended upon the King's Government, utterly overthrown.† He called upon Elizabeth therefore for aid, and having obtained it, by an army under the command of Sir William Drury,‡ laid regular siege to the Castle, which, after standing out a month, surrendered; Melvil says on condition, the other accounts state it to have been at discretion. The result, however, was, that Grange was taken and executed, and thereby the whole nation brought under the Government of the King and Regent.

There are certainly very different accounts extant of this transaction, as may be seen in Rapin, who is disposed to suspect Melvil of partiality and misrepresentation, which is not improbable. There can be little doubt, but that Grange

* From a letter Sir Francis Walsingham wrote to Lord Burghley, dated Paris, Jan. 14, 1572, it may be seen how much of trick and dissimulation there was in this apparent submission of the Duke and Huntley, and how much art the French Court was practising to deceive both Elizabeth and the Scottish Regent.—Digges, 315.

† This is entirely confirmed by Dr. Stuart's account. "Kirkaldy," says he, "though in a dangerous situation, did not lose his courage; he continued to give annoyance to the King's party by battering the town, and entertained sanguine expectations of troops from France." Had these troops from France arrived before the Queen's, the breach of the treaty of Blois, as Rapin observes, would have rested with the French; Elizabeth, however, knowing that they were intended to be sent, chose to be beforehand with them.

‡ Among those who accompanied Sir William Drury to the siege of Edinburgh Castle, Mr. Thomas Cecil appears to have been one.—Nichols, i. 394.

sought only to gain time or deceive the Regent, who had better information than Grange suspected. Dr. Stuart, however, represents the Regent as actuated by nothing but cruelty, and charges Elizabeth with having inspirited and promoted all his violence and outrage. These are certainly heavy accusations, and yet in the very next passage she appears to have done quite otherwise; this we shall therefore copy, as Lord Burghley seems to have been concerned in it, and it cannot but help to confirm, what the learned author just cited, is continually disposed to dispute, namely, that neither lenity nor severity, restraint or forbearance, could secure Elizabeth effectually from the intrigues and mischievous designs of her enemies; for though the release of Mary, might be the first and ostensible object of Elizabeth's foreign foes, we can never help regarding it ourselves as only a preliminary step to the Papists' "golden day," of a complete English Revolution.

"But while she was giving way to her jealousies, and stimulating the enormities of the Regent, she yielded not to the solicitations with which he was now pertinaciously urging her for delivering the Bishop of Ross into his hands. He was inflamed against this prelate with all the bitterness of an implacable and unprincipled enemy; and it was undoubtedly his intention to execute him publicly as a traitor to his King. Leslie, in the solitude of his prison, heard of these solicitations; and full of anxiety and terror, sent to Elizabeth a very laboured oration, stating all the arguments that ought to influence her in his favour. The French Ambassador remonstrated with her against violating, by any cruelty to him, the law of nations, and the principles and obligations of reason and honour. Her own Counsellors were not fond of an outrage which might be resented against the Ambassadors of England. The applications accordingly of the Regent were finally rejected; and the Bishop of Ross, being brought before the Privy Council, was informed by Lord Burghley, that Elizabeth gave him permission to pass into Scotland or into France. He desired not, he said, to return to his own country, as his religion was different from that established there, as he approved not the authority of the King, and as the Regent was earnest to take away his life. The Privy Council presented to him the Queen's licence to depart for France, and after making proper acknowledgments for her clemency,* he withdrew hastily from her dominions. His zeal, however, for the Queen of Scots followed him, and he endeavoured to stir up the Emperor, the Pope, and the King of France to exert themselves in her behalf." We should not blame the zeal of the Bishop, did we not know how the potentates above stood affected towards Elizabeth, and how earnestly he had promised that Queen in his letter of thanks, to meddle no more with public affairs.—See his letter, Murdin, p. 66.

But as this Prelate is still said by some, from this time, to have devoted his life to religion and study, and as his character is of some importance in the history of those very extraordinary times, we shall select some portions of Dr. Stuart's character of him, as illustrative of his talents as a statesman, premising only that we do not fix upon them, because they discover to us the bad parts of his character, but to shew in what particular points he resembled other statesmen of those days. The historian begins with saying, "It required uncommon talents to engage in political struggles with the Ministers of Elizabeth." This we thoroughly believe, but it does not at all prove that the latter were the authors of the disingenuous and insincere mode of proceeding, which disgraced all the principal Courts of Europe in the sixteenth century.

"His propensities," says Dr. Stuart, "carried him keenly to virtue, but the situations in which he was placed, taught him dissimulation and artifice. To achieve an honourable purpose, he was willing to depart from the scruples and delicacies which are characteristic of a perfect integrity, but in the general strain of his conduct, he exercised a candour and probity, which are seldom attained by ecclesiastics who mingle in secular affairs.—He respected too little the natural and inherent rights of mankind, he respected too much the dogmas and formalities of the Roman Catholic religion. His history of Scotland, which he wrote in the Latin language, is remarkable for the classical elegance of its composition, for an interesting impartiality,* and for an instructive experience in affairs. His defence of the honour of Mary, and his account of his negotiations in her behalf are more partial and more declamatory."

The exile of the Bishop of Ross, the defection of the Duke of Chatelherault, Argyle, and Huntley, the execution of Grange of Kirkaldy, and the death of Maitland [see under the preceding year], who suffered, as it is supposed, by poi-

* Rapin does not give him credit for such impartiality, even in his History. "He writ," says he, "the History of Scotland, from the beginning to the year 1561. What he says of the Earl of Murray, towards the end of his History, speaking of the first troubles in Scotland, and which Camden has taken care to copy, plainly shews what might have been expected from him, had he continued it to the end of the war."

son, administered by himself, as some say, but according to others, by the management of his enemies; reduced the affairs of the captive Queen to a low ebb.—Morton, by thus baffling all the schemes and designs of his opponents, became a powerful governor of the nation in the name of the King, and displayed a mixed character of tyranny and justice; practically severe, and yet an improver of the laws; sufficiently under the control of Elizabeth, to give her great hopes of more quiet, and more security in the North; while the timely removal of the Duke of Alva from the Netherlands, rid her of another most troublesome neighbour.

Having thus brought down the history of Scotland, as well as of England, to the conclusion of the year 1574, we pass on to the affairs of the Continent. The Protestants had a hard struggle to maintain in Flanders, under the Prince of Orange, who lost both his brothers contending against the tyranny of the Duke of Alva. Some succours were expected from England and from France, but in both instances they failed; England was tardy in affording assistance, and France threw aside the mask she had assumed to beguile the Protestants in general, by the massacre of Paris.* This atrocious event, seemed to explain many previous

* We have it in our power now, to refer to a curious dissertation by Mr. Turner on the subject of this massacre, in which he endeavours to shew that the main object of it was, to check the reformation in Flanders; and to this end, to prevent the Prince of Orange receiving such succours from the French, as the young King, Charles the IXth, was inclined, in conjunction with the English, to send to him. And this he attributes to a confederacy between the Duke of Guise, the Papal Nuncio, Philip of Spain, and the Duc d'Anjou. As we have said much of the King's great dissimulation, previously to the massacre, under the year 1572; and as we should be glad to do him any justice in our power, we shall not withhold from our readers the information, that Mr. Turner's disquisition goes far to exonerate Charles, from being so much an accessory before the fact, as he has been generally esteemed. It is impossible to rescue his memory from the disgrace of a most cruel and unfeeling participation in the horrors of the scene at the time; but it may help to prove in some degree, that as far as regarded himself he might have been led to believe, that the causes of the massacre, were such as he alleged to Elizabeth. Mr. Turner's discussion of the point is certainly curious, and well deserving of attention; especially as he has cited some passages from the account of the massacre by an eye-witness, only recently discovered in the "Archives Episcopales de Wiener Neustadt," in Germany, and published there 1826.

As the attention of the public has been drawn in some measure to the subject of late years, in consequence of Dr. Lingard having cited some authorities, as the testimony of Hugonot writers, contrary to the fact, according to the strictures of the Edinburgh Reviewers, June 1826; it may be the more proper to notice the work above. It consists of a letter addressed to the Bishop of Neustadt, by a distinguished ecclesiastic, then at the Court of France.

An account of the principal authors to be consulted on the subject may be seen in a note to mysterious circumstances, such as the treaty of St. Germains, particularly favourable to the Hugonots, after great victories obtained against them; Charles the Ninth's "own peace," as he called it, pretending that he had agreed to it in opposition to his Council, the Queen Mother, and the House of Guise;*—the marriage of the King or Prince of Navarre (for his mother was still living, though she died soon after), with the Princess Margaret, sister of Charles IX., evidently intended to draw the heads of the Protestant party to Court;—the pretence of making war on the King of Spain, which appeared to be a great dereliction of the Catholic cause; and being communicated to the Hugonots, as from authority, by the Mareschal de Cosse, greatly encouraged the former to put their trust in Charles;—the deception practised against the Prince of Orange and Protestants associated with him, through his brother Lewis of Nassau, that Charles, in his eagerness to be revenged of the King of Spain, would support the Prince of Orange in the Low Countries;—the insidious arrangements to induce the Admiral Coligni to come to Paris to treat of these affairs with the King and Council, and the allowing the Prince of Nassau even to enlist French Hugonot soldiers to serve against Philip in Flanders; all these things were probably but so many blinds, as well as the negotiations with England, to lull the Protestants asleep, and bring them into the net of Charles IX. (an expression of his own).

These were what the Parisian Massacre appeared at last to render intelligible, though dreadfully to the surprise of the Protestants in all directions. The only military resistance and opposition was at Rochelle, and which fortunately, to a certain degree, succeeded. The besieging army was not prepared for the sallies of the besieged, which were found to be very formidable, nor had it calculated upon the succours which the Count of Montgomery was prepared to throw in from England; not with the actual consent, but rather with the connivance of the English Government, though these succours, in themselves, turned out to be but of small account. Important losses were sustained on the King's part,† and though he had the benefit of a base tergiversation or panic on the part of the Commandant of Rochelle, La Noue, yet in the end the Protestants obtained their point. The Duc d'Anjou, who commanded the King's forces, was elected King of Poland, and obliged to leave the army. Terms, therefore, were hastily entered into, and the Protestants almost obtained a victory, from the easy conditions granted them. This, however, happened in the month of July, 1573.

The King of Poland passed to his new sovereignty, not by sea, as was at one time judged to be necessary, but by land. He had not been very long there, however, before he was recalled to take possession of another crown, by the demise of his brother, Charles IX. of France; who died on the 30th of May, 1574, at the early age of twenty-three, leaving his mother Regent. "He had religion," says the French historian Daniel, "which was a rare court virtue at that time, and a great zeal for the exterminating of heresy out of his kingdom." This year was also fatal to another great man, one almost as great, from the influence of his family, as the King himself; we mean the Cardinal of Lorrain, uncle to Mary Queen of Scots. This Prelate died soon after the return of Henry III. from Poland.—He might be regarded as another great loss to Mary, though it was from his bigoted and ambitious house that most of her troubles may be said to have had their origin.

CHAP. III.

Seventeenth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign commenced November 17, 1574.

Henry III. and Elizabeth confirm the treaty of Blois—Cox, Bishop of Ely, in trouble—New Statutes for St. John's College, Cambridge—Westminster Scholars—Puritans troublesome—Deaths of Pilkington and Parker—Archbishop Parker's Legacy to Lord Burghley—The latter misrepresented at Court about Mary Queen of Scots—His letter to Lord Shrewsbury—Faithful to the Queen—Account of Lord Burghley's feelings towards Mary—Visit to Kenilworth—Leicester's letter to Lord Burghley.

ACCORDING to Lord Burghley's Diary in Murdin, the first thing that seems to have occupied the attention of his Lordship this year, was the disposition shewn by the new King of France, Henry III., to ratify and abide by the treaty of Blois, as negotiated, concluded, and agreed to, by his deceased brother, Charles IX.: "Feb. 20. Henry III. the French King, doth by his writing, dated at Reyns, under his hand and seal, ratify the treaty of mutual defence, made 19 April, 1572, between her Majesty and his brother deceased, Charles IX."*

The Queen, according to the same memorandums, ratified the treaty on her part, April 6, which received a more formal ratification by Henry, on the last day of the same month.

"April—ultimo. Henry, now French King, ratifyeth the treaty of Peace, made 19 April, 1572, with Charles IX. his brother, which confirmation was delivered to Dr. Dale, Ambassador."

This treaty, however, still presented some difficulties; for, whereas it had been questioned how far a treaty of mutual defence extended to any cause of religion, it was now settled that it should do so: in which Elizabeth seems to have looked to this advantage, that if Henry should provoke a civil war with his

* See in Mr. Ellis's Collection of Original Letters, a curious and very circumstantial account of Charles's ratification of this treaty, in a letter from Sir Thomas Smith at Paris, to Lord Burghley, June 18, 1572, vol. iii. 2d series, letter cxci.

Hugonot subjects, which he soon did, he could scarcely claim assistance as the party attacked; and at all events, that in the case of such a war, he was not very likely to trust his defence to any of Elizabeth's soldiers.

With regard to domestic affairs, Strype, in his Life of Whitgift, vol. i. 143, calls this "a busy and contentious year;" and so, indeed, it was, and not without trouble to the Lord Treasurer, though we may very well be excused from going very largely into particulars, after the diligent, careful, and copious writer just cited. In his Annals of the Reformation under Elizabeth, vol. ii. chapters xxxiv. xxxv. will be found a very circumstantial account of the great difficulties into which Cox, Bishop of Ely, formerly preceptor to Edward VI., and therefore one of Lord Burghley's earliest friends and acquaintance,* was thrown, in consequence of the attacks making upon his Episcopal demesnes by Hatton, as already noticed, and the Lord North. It appears to have been a case of complicated persecution on the part of one at least of those two Courtiers,† and it is very much to the credit of Lord Burghley, that he should have been not only appealed to by the injured Bishop, as "an asylum, refuge, &c." as the terms run, but that he should have been found active to set some bounds to those exorbitant demands. The Queen had given her sanction to the spoils contemplated, which made the case more serious and particular, but Lord Burghley appears to have done all he could do to relieve and assist his old friend and acquaintance; not, however, without incurring some blame at Court, the drift of which was very intelligible, as proceeding from the friends of the opposite party—it being insinuated, that in resisting Lord North's demands and supporting the Bishop, he was resisting the Queen, who had sanctioned the acts of her Courtiers, and siding with one who was called in question by her Majesty's order and commandment. We may easily suppose that the Queen in her indulgence to those courtly depredators (for such they certainly were),‡

* See vol. i.

† Lord North's behaviour to the Bishop, and the charges he brought against him, were mean and pitiful; the Bishop's answers to his charges equally spirited and dignified.—See Strype's Annals, ii. Appendix, Nos. xlix. l. li. Whoever will be at the pains to compare the charges of the noble Lord, with the answers returned, may see how cruel a case of base slander and courtly persecution this really was.

‡ The Bishop's letters to the Queen (in Latin), Annals, ii. Appendix, Nos. xlvii. xlviii. are exceedingly good, as relating to the surrender of Ely House to Mr. Hatton in perpetuity, and the demise of his manor of Somersham to the Queen herself for the Lord North. In some reasons drawn up for the consideration of the Lord Treasurer, he refers the latter to Calvin's Commentary on 1 Tim. v.

was under the influence of that pretended Puritan, but notorious spoliator of Church property, Lord Leicester.

Lord Burghley was appealed to also by the same Bishop, as visitor of St. John's College, Cambridge, to countenance the introduction of some new statutes, for the better regulation of that eminent society; the beginning of the Bishop's letter deserves to be transcribed:

"The great zeal you bear for the Queen's government of the University of Cambridge, whereof you are High Chancellor, and the love you have to St. John's College (where you sucked much good learning), do move you, I doubt not, to be careful for the preservation of both."—This was a compliment the Lord Treasurer richly deserved; his attention to his favourite University (his ALMA MATER) amidst a multiplicity of other more public businesses, was, to say the least, quite exemplary and creditable, though it was the occasion of much trouble to him from the peculiar character of the times, and the puritanical disputes. The issue of the present appeal was, that a new set of statutes should be framed and approved for his own College of St. John's, and duly established.

But the Lord Treasurer had to do with Oxford as well as Cambridge; a question having arisen there with regard to the admission of scholars on the foundation at Westminster School, to be students of Christ Church, and with whose right some had interfered by procuring letters of admission from the Queen. The College seems to have defended itself by a reference to the inadequate amount of vacancies, which did not fall out so as to accommodate all claimants; and it was willing to leave things to the arbitrement of the Treasurer. One of those elected from Westminster, happened to have carried with him recommendatory letters from Lord Burghley, but he was rejected, and forced to return, as he expressed it, "omni spe derelictus." This young man was a candidate on the foundation of the School Statute; his appeal to Lord Burghley was, on this account, entirely reasonable, if it were strictly in the power of that noble Lord to decide the question, which we cannot pretend to say, though it seems to have been assumed in the address made to him, according to Strype's account. "Ravis,"* he says, "urged that Lord to determine in behalf of that Statute of Westminster—and that he having now a power of deciding that matter in the behalf of poor scholars, inflamed towards the study of learning, would do that good work to determine, "utrum illa Westmonasterii Schola, tua semper bonitate munita, pristino eoque legitimo emolumento spolietur, ac jamdiu rerum injuria, et temporum iniquitate vexata, aliquando per te tuamque mansuetudinam recreetur."

* Ravis afterwards rose to be Bishop of London.

Another scholar, Edward Carow, standing also in the same situation, addressed his Lordship at the same time, telling him, "how both his own hope, et quanta omnium illius gymnasii salus in te sita, et allocata sit—Non mea solum, sed totius Wesmonasterii jam res agitur."

That Lord Burghley could expound and decide upon the Statute, as a private person, there can be no doubt, and he seems to have done so in concurrence with Goodman,* then Dean of Westminster, in favour of the Scholars; but whether he was fully able to relieve, either the College or the Scholars, from the unstatutable competition of the Queen's letters, procured by other persons,† is a different question. Leicester was Chancellor of Oxford, and more responsible upon this point than Lord Burghley; the appeal to the latter, therefore, appears to have proceeded from a high estimation of his justice and integrity, rather than upon any decided right of jurisdiction, as Lord Treasurer; though, indeed, the College, as well as the rejected scholars, seems to have commended the whole cause to his decision. How the case was actually and finally settled at this time, does not appear from Strype; but subsequently, Lord Burghley was specially applied to by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Colleges at Cambridge, to interpose there also, as Chancellor, against the Queen's letters, mandamuses, &c. which, as it was stated, "proved a great hinderance and uneasiness to the students who looked to being preferred for their merit." The letter is a very good one, and may be read at length in the Appendix to Strype's 2d volume of Annals, b. ii. No. xviii. addressed, "Honoratissimo domino dño de Burghleye, totius Angliæ summo thesaurario, et Academiæ Cantabrigiensis cancellario dignissimo."

* Goodman was this year a candidate for the vacant see of Norwich, but defeated in his purposes, probably by the interference of Leicester, as the Archbishop seemed to apprehend, who, writing to Lord Burghley of the several candidates, told him, that "among them all, he preferred the first [Goodman] for learning, life, and government;" and more particularly, "because he saw him and very few else," opposed to the Puritans, "whose governance," if it should prevail, "would," he was assured, "in conclusion, undo her [meaning the Queen] and all others that depended on her."—Strype's Parker, ii. 422.

† The Queen in these letters absolutely took upon her to dispense with all observance of the statutes.—See her letter to the Master and Fellows of Queen's College, Cambridge, April 24, 1576; Nichols' Progresses, ii. pp. 3, 4.

The Puritans were also troublesome this year, in their endeavours to alter the government of the Church, overthrow the Bishops, scatter their revenues, and defame the Liturgy. Cartwright took the field again, in a second reply to Whitgift, whom he treated with so great rudeness, and so little weight of argument, that the latter did not think fit to answer him any more.

One thing may be said to the credit of those in power; the learned of the puritanical party, who had been ejected from situations of honour or profit, for what they alleged to be a conscientious non-conformity, had other appointments given them, more compatible with their scruples, and this in a great measure, through the means of Lord Burghley, whom Strype on this account, calls the "good Lord Treasurer," and "that kindly affectioned Nobleman." Cartwright was made Master of a hospital in Warwick, Lever of one near Durham,* and Sampson, as has been said before, of the hospital in Leicester, of which he took great care, and being in fear this year that some tithes belonging to it, would be alienated, he applied to the Lord Treasurer to befriend him and his charge, who did so, almost beyond his expectations, procuring even a statute to be made for confirmation of the hospital in all its rights, with so uncommon dispatch,† as to excite much notice.

But to shew that it was not for their non-conformity Lord Burghley so befriended them, his Lordship assisted Pilkington also, this year (the "good old Bishop of Durham," as Strype calls him), on an application addressed to him as the "common patron of the Clergy and their causes;" this was the last attention Lord Burghley had to pay to that worthy Prelate, who died soon after.‡ Before which, the Church had to sustain another great loss by the death of the Primate, Dr. Parker, who, to adopt the plain and unadorned style of his faithful biographer,

* He [Lever], Neal tells us, "was a resolute Non-conformist, and wrote letters to encourage the deprived ministers to stand by their principles, and wait patiently for a further reformation." On his death in 1577, the hospital [Sherborn] was given to his brother.

† D'Ewes's Journal, 252. The bill was read the first, second, and third time in one day, and passed the house. Quod nota, says D'Ewes.

‡ On the death of Pilkington, two competitors appeared for the vacant see; May, Archdeacon of the North Riding of Yorkshire, supported by Lord Shrewsbury, Lord Leicester, and Lord Sussex; and Barnes, Bishop of Carlisle. The latter obtained it by the Lord Treasurer's interest, as may be seen in Strype, with the Bishop's own letter to Lord Burghley on his promotion, Appendix, b. ii. No. iv. in which he calls the latter his "singular good Lord and patron," and his "only preferer to Carlisle, where he had served his seven years." May became Bishop of Carlisle in the room of Barnes.

on the 17th of May, 1575, "concluded his holy and painful life,* in his palace at Lambeth; being called by his heavenly Master from his toilsome work, to give account of the feeding of his flock, unto the chief Shepherd and Bishop."

The Archbishop had indeed latterly a truly toilsome work upon his hands, to keep down the Puritans, who, he was certain, however trifling some of their cavils might seem, had a settled and determined purpose to change the whole Government. He judged, that even his friend, the Lord Treasurer, did not see so far into their designs as himself, and often admonished him to beware of that misnamed policy, which, by conniving too much at their wilfulness, encouraged them to thwart the Queen's religion, her injunctions, and her laws. In the last letter he ever wrote to him, and that from his death-bed, as it proved to be, he says, "Doth your Lordship think, that I care either for cap, tippet, surplice, or wafer-bread? but that the law has so established them?" He plainly discovered, that unless discipline were used, contempt of law and authority would follow. "If I, you, or any other Great Papists (for so the Puritans called all the urgers of ecclesiastical orders), should favour the Pope, or his religion, [so] that we should pinch Christ's true Gospel, woe be unto us all!"

Nothing, however, seems to have offended the Primate more, than Leicester's constant but secret endeavours to blacken him with the Queen, whom, as regarded the Puritans, he told the Lord Treasurer, "he saw in constancy almost alone." And so indeed it really was with respect to the Court; the Treasurer being rather over indulgent to them, not in encouragement of their infringing the laws, but because he esteemed many of them to be learned and conscientious persons; he was besides, as is well known, strongly inclined, as most suitable to the then state of the kingdom, to such a Catholic and comprehensive ecclesiastical system, as should conciliate, rather than offend, all doubtful minds; and was not for forcing consciences, wherever any decent outward submission to the existing laws, could be secured. It is the more incumbent on us to notice these things, because the reign of Elizabeth has been stigmatized as a reign of extreme severity and rigour towards Non-conformists of all kinds, though there is nothing of which we feel more assured, especially as far as regards the eminent statesman whose life we are writing, than that as far as religion alone was concerned, it was a reign, if not of such extensive toleration as has since been established, of very extraordinary indulgence for those days, both as regarded Papists and Puritans.*

* "Integris sensibus, ætate optimâ, è vitâ, tanquam è scenâ bene peractæ fabulæ, discessit." Alex. Nevil. Parker of course fares ill in Mr. Neal's History of the Puritans, while Pilkington is as highly commended; they had both of them very difficult tasks to perform. In Parker's case, there is no doubt that he saw clearly into the bad consequences likely to ensue, from an open contempt of the laws, which had imposed a duty upon him, from which he could not shrink. Pilkington, being farther from the Court, in a more barbarous part of the kingdom, and surrounded with Papists, was in want of preachers, more able and zealous in the cause, than was the case with some of the earliest conforming ministers.

To conclude our account of the Archbishop, though he certainly had some misgivings of his friend, the Lord Treasurer, in regard to the dangers which seemed to threaten the Church, yet that he died in perfect charity with him, not only appears from almost the last letter he ever wrote (or rather dictated), being addressed to him, but from his being particularly remembered in his will,† in the following bequest of a ring, &c.:

"Do et lego honoratissimo viro Domino Will. Cecil, Equiti aurat. Domino Thesaurario Angliæ, annulum meum optimum aureum cum sapphiro in multas quadras cæsa, et lagenam eburneam."‡

In the course of this year Lord Burghley had nearly fallen into difficulties at Court, by a visit he paid to the well at Buxton, for the recovery of his health. As he had been particularly instrumental in procuring the Queen's permission for Mary to go to the same place, contrary to the advice and opinion of others about the Court, it is not to be wondered that his enemies there, Leicester probably being at the head of them, should seize upon the opportunity to excite sus-

† The Archbishop, as is well known, was a great benefactor to the University of Cambridge; an account of which, and of his legacies, &c. may of course be seen in Strype.

‡ The Archbishop is said to have written or dictated a letter to the Queen on his death-bed, which was not delivered, but in which letter he charged the Lord Keeper and the Lord Burghley with misadvising her, as to the spoliation of the Church by exchanges, and other modes of alienation; he regarded the Church revenues as a sort of consecrated property not to be meddled with, and it might have been well if it had been so regarded by the courtiers of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Elizabeth, but that the Lord Keeper and Lord Burghley, were the "chief procurers of the spoil of the Church," as Whitgift seemed to represent the Archbishop's sentiments, is very inconsistent with other accounts extant. The latter especially, seems to have been regarded generally by the Bishops and Clergy, as the protector of Church property, where he could do it effectually. But what has been said on this occasion, may be seen in Strype's Life of Parker, b. iv. ch. 44. and in Collier, ii. 548. Sometimes, we must grant, Lord Burghley seems to have over-rated the abilities of the Bishops to entertain strangers, receive state prisoners, &c.; especially considering the defalcations of revenue to which they had been subjected:—but we have hinted at this before.

picions in the breast of Elizabeth, as to the real motive of his journey thither. He was undoubtedly the most vigilant of all her Counsellors, in regard to the dangers that threatened either her person or her crown, and she might be expected therefore to be startled at any insinuation of a change in his sentiments, principles, or actions. Her temper besides could not but give every advantage to the enemies of Lord Burghley, upon a point so delicate; though it decidedly proves thus much in his favour, that his absence from the Court, so far from helping Mary's cause, disposed others who were left there, to foment and aggravate the Queen's jealousies and suspicions, judging Lord Burghley, as it would seem, to be no such inveterate enemy to Mary, in Elizabeth's eyes, as to be proof against the charges they might invent upon such an occasion, to his disgrace and ruin.

Having premised these things, we shall copy Lord Burghley's memorable letter to Lord Shrewsbury, which may be said to reveal what had been passing against him in his absence from the Court, and to disclose his own feelings and sentiments upon the occasion. Lord Shrewsbury had written to him, after his departure from Buxton, to propose a marriage, or contract of marriage, between his younger son,* and a daughter of Lord Burghley. Lord Burghley's answer was to the following effect:

"My very good Lord,—My most hearty and due commendations done, I cannot sufficiently express in words the inward hearty affection that I conceive by your Lordship's friendly offer of your marriage of your younger son, and that in such a friendly sort, by your own letter, and as your Lordship writeth, the same proceeding of yourself: now, my Lord, as I think myself much beholden to you for this your Lordship's kindness, and manifest argument of a faithful good-will, so must I pray your Lordship to accept mine answer, with assured opinion of my continuance in the same towards your Lordship. There are especially two causes why I do not in plain terms consent by way of conclusion hereto; the one, for that my daughter is but young in years, and upon some reasonable respects, I have determined (notwithstanding I have been very honourably offered matches) not to treat of marrying her, if I may live so long, until she shall be above fifteen or sixteen; and if I were of more likelihood myself to live longer than I look to do, she should not with my liking, be married before she were near eighteen or twenty. The second cause why I defer to yield to conclusion with your Lordship, is grounded upon such consideration as, if it were not truly to satisfy your Lordship, and to avoid a just offence which your Lordship might conceive of my forbearing, I would not by writing or message utter, but only by speech to your Lordship's self. My Lord, it is over true, and over much against reason, that upon my being at Buxton last, advantage was sought by some that loved me not, to confirm in her Majesty a former conceit which had been laboured to put into her head, that I was of late time become friendly to the Queen of Scots, and that I had no disposition to encounter her practices, and now at my being at Buxton, her Majesty did directly conceive that my being there was, by means of your Lordship and my Lady, to enter into intelligence with the Queen of Scots; and hereof at my return to her Majesty's presence, I had very sharp reproofs for my going to Buxton, with plain charging of me for favouring the Queen of Scots; and that in so earnest a sort as I never looked for, knowing my integrity to her Majesty, but specially knowing how contrariously the Queen of Scots conceived of me for many things passed to the offence of the Queen of Scots; and yet true it is, I never indeed gave just cause by any private affection of my own, or for myself, to offend the Queen of Scots; but whatsoever I did, was for the service of my own Sovereign Lady and Queen, which if it were yet again to be done, I would do. And though I know myself subject to contrary workings of displeasure, yet will I not, for remedy of any of them both, decline from the duty I owe to God, and my Sovereign Queen. For I know and do understand, that I am in this contrary sort, maliciously depraved, and yet in secret sort; on the one part, and that of long time, that I am the most dangerous enemy, and evil-willer to the Queen of Scots; on the other side, that I am also a secret well-willer to her, and her title, and that I have made my party good with her: now, my Lord, no man can make both these true together; but it sufficeth for such as like not me in doing my duty to deprave me, and yet in such is done in darkness as I cannot get opportunity to convince them in the light. In all these crossings, my good Lord, I appeal to God, who knoweth, yea (I thank him infinitely), who directeth my thoughts to intend principally the service and honour of God, and jointly with it the surety and greatness of my Sovereign Lady, the Queen's Majesty, and for any other respect that may tend to those two, I appeal to God to punish me if I have any. As for the Queen of Scots, truly I have no spot of evil meaning to her; neither do I mean to deal with any titles to the Crown. If she shall intend any evil to the Queen's Majesty, my Sovereign, for her sake I must and will mean to impeach her; and therein I may be her unfriend or worse.

"Well, now, my good Lord, your Lordship seeth I have made a long digression from my answer, but I trust your Lordship can consider what moveth me thus to digress; surely it behoveth me not only to live uprightly, but to avoid all probable arguments, that may be gathered to render me suspected to her Majesty, whom I serve with all dutifulness and sincerity; and therefore I gather this, that if it were understood that there was a communication or a purpose of marriage, between your Lordship's son and my daughter, I am sure there would be an advantage sought to increase these former suspicions, considering the young years of our two children.—I think it best, as the marriage could not take effect, to refer the motion in silence, and yet so to order it with ourselves, that when time shall hereafter be more convenient, we may (and then also with less cause of vain suspicion) renew it. And in the mean time, I must confess myself much bounden to your Lordship for your goodness; wishing your Lordship's son all the good education that may be meet to teach him to fear God, love your Lordship, his natural father, and to know his friends; without any curiosity of human learning, which without the fear of God, I see doth great hurt to all youth in this time and age. My Lord, I pray you bear with my scribbling, which I think your Lordship shall hardly read, and yet I could not use my man's hand in such a matter as this is. From Hampton Court, 24 December, 1575.

"Your Lordship's most assured at command, W. BURGHLEY."

"To the Right Honourable, my singular good Lord, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Earl Marshal of England, and one of the Lords of her Majesty's Privy Council."

This letter was not sent for some days, the common post not being to be trusted; and in the mean time Lord Burghley had received from the Earl a costly gift of plate, "as a new year's token," for which he wrote at the same time to thank him; his second letter being dated, January 1, 1576.*

No man could have more reason to resent any imputations cast on his loyalty and dutifulness to his Sovereign, than Lord Burghley; it was his ruling principle; connecting, that is, the safety of his Sovereign with the safety and security of the nation; and obedience to the Crown, with obedience to the laws. Had his obedience been servile or self-interested, his situation would have been less onerous and his way more clear; but he had frequently to combat some of the Queen's strongest prejudices, and to recommend measures, not merely obnoxious but offensive to others of the Court, and those in greater favour than himself on some accounts; any other person in his place, had Elizabeth's temper been so capricious or ungovernable as some would have it, would have been discredited, crushed, and ruined in a moment, upon the suggestions of such great but secret enemies, as he had to contend with; but his merits, and the value of his advice, happened to be too justly appreciated by the Queen's own understanding, to give any permanent advantage to his adversaries; a few sudden and transient clouds might arise, which it might require time and care to disperse, but he had a right to expect that with care and time, all that did arise might be dispersed, and in truth he found it so. In the instance above, he relied entirely on his dutifulness to his own Sovereign, to account for his actions; against Elizabeth, he was never a well-willer (to use his own words) to Mary, nor could be so; but he was never so ill a willer to her, as to aggravate her misfortunes, or do more than impeach to the utmost of his power, her practices against England, and against Elizabeth, and this deserves to be attended to; what Elizabeth was taught to suspect was this, that he was becoming so friendly to the Queen of Scots, as to have no longer any disposition to encounter her practices; they were her practices, and not her person, to which he opposed himself, and this he boldly told Lord Shrewsbury, he would even do, while they might appear to be directed against his own Sovereign; he was aware that upon acting on a principle approaching in any degree to impartiality, he should expose himself to the contrary imputations of being the Queen of Scots greatest open enemy, or her greatest, but secret friend; if, as in duty bound, he sought to protect Elizabeth, against the intrigues and cabals of Mary's pretended friends, he was then accounted the greatest enemy of that unfortunate Princess; but if he sought to promote her comfort in any way, to procure her any indulgences on the part of Elizabeth, or to thwart those who were upon a different principle her decided enemies, then he was exposed to the artful practices of his courtly enemies, and misrepresented to Elizabeth.—This we verily believe, is a just picture of his difficult situation, as Elizabeth's principal political adviser. Mary "gave ear," to use an expression of her own ambassador Bishop Leslie, too readily to the discontented subjects of Elizabeth, and to her foreign Catholic friends, as they called themselves; and thereby rendered herself obnoxious to the suspicions of Elizabeth, and very fairly exposed herself to greater restraints, and a more watchful attention to all her actions, than would otherwise have been the case; and perhaps, could she have been persuaded to intrigue less with Elizabeth's decided enemies,* to have given more scope to the Protestant interests in Scotland; to have acknowledged some of her errors and false steps; or had Elizabeth married, and thereby quieted the disturbance about the succession, she might have been set at liberty, or at the least restored to a great enjoyment of rank, consequence, and consideration; but unfortunately, being in the power of Elizabeth, she went on intriguing by every channel of communication she could command, against Elizabeth, her person, and her crown; against the Protestant interests in Scotland, and consequently against a large proportion of her own subjects; driven by these very intrigues into the arms of Elizabeth, the case was complicated, but capable of being understood in all its bearings, certainly not by any superficial readers of history, but by those who have patience to go thoroughly into the depths of such an inquiry, and are sufficiently free from prejudices, to acknowledge the truth, wherever it can be made to appear; for, with regard to the dark and perplexed transactions of the sixteenth century, it may justly be regarded as a spirit we have to call from the "vasty deep."

We must not conclude our account of the year 1575, without observing that this was the year of the Queen's most memorable visit to Kenilworth, so renowned in history and romance. For the former, we must refer to Nichols's elaborate account of it,† and for the latter to Sir Walter Scott's celebrated novel of Kenilworth; rendered interesting by bold anachronisms, illustrative of some of the worst actions in the life of Lord Leicester. The historical account is very curious, as a true picture of the amusements of those days,‡ and as descriptive of a succession of allegorical pageants, the taste for which is passed; mixed up with strange poetry, most whimsical conceits, and a deal of ancient mythology.§

* "He saith, he did from time to time tell the Duke [of Norfolk] of the Bishop's [Ross] talks and encouragements, and the Duke answered commonly, that if the Queen of Scots would be content and quiet, and suffer a year or two, he doubted not but God would put in the Queen's Majesty's mind so to deal with her, as she and her friends should be content."—Barker's answers, Murdin, 103.

"I will not cast away myself, my children and my friends, for none of them all; I am bound to the Queen of Scots in honour, if I can comfort and quiet her I am content, otherwise I will not."—The Duke of Norfolk, as reported by Barker, Murdin, 105.

† Incorporating the accounts of Gascoigne and Laneham.

‡ Among these amusements, bear-baiting was one so much in vogue, that no fewer than thirteen were provided for this fete at Kenilworth, all to be baited with a large species of ban-dogs.

§ We must not speak slightingly of these representations, if it be true, as some have conjectured, that Shakspeare was present at all that passed at Kenilworth, being then only in his twelfth year; and that he probably derived "from the impression thereby made on his glowing imagina-

Strype, with his usual carefulness and sobriety of selection, (the historians before him having scarcely noticed the event, though as Bishop Hurd has remarked, "it claimed a remembrance in the annals of our country,") has not entered far into the details of the entertainment, which Laneham, in his very interesting and amusing letter,* tells us, "was so great and noble, that for persons, place, time, cost, devices, strangeness, and abundance of all that ever he saw, and wherever he had been, in France and Flanders, long and many a day, he never saw any where so memorable as this."

It was on the 9th of July that the Earl of Leicester met the Queen at Ichingham,† a town and manor of his own, within [seven] miles of Kenilworth,‡ where tion that bias for theatrical amusements, which afterwards proved the basis of his own glory, and of his country's poetic fame."—Drake.

* The original title-page of this letter is curious. "A letter, wherein part of the entertainment untoo the Queenz Majesty, at Killingworth Castle in Warwick-Sheer, in this Soomerz Progress 1575, iz signified; from a freend officer attendant in the Court, unto his freend a citizen and merchaunt in London."

There are two copies of this book in black letter in the Bodleian Library; of the author as much as could be recovered, may be seen in Nichols.—He was called Clerk of the Council Chamber-door. How well qualified he was to describe the wonders he saw, the reader who has never yet perused his entertaining letter, may judge from the following account of the Italian tumbler.

"Noow within allso, in the mean time, waz thear sheawed before her Highness, by an Italian, such feats of agilitie, in goinges, turninges, tumblinges, castinges, hops, jumps, leaps, skips, springs, gambaud, soomersauts, caprelliez and flights; forward, backward, sydewize, a downward, upward, and with sundry windings, gyrings, and circumflexions; allso lightly and with such easiness, as by me in feaw words, it iz not expressibl by pen or speech I tell you plain; I bleast me by my faith to behold him, and began to doout whither a waz a man or a spirite, and I ween had doouted me till this time, had it not been that anon I bethought me of men that can reazon and talk with too toongs, and with too persons at onez, sing like burds, curteiz of behaviour of body strong, and in joynts so nimbl withall, that their bonez seem as lythie and plyaunt as syneuz. Nay, master Martin, I tell you no jest; for both Diodorus Siculus, an auncient Greek Historiographer, in his third book of the acts of the olld Egypcians; and also from him Conrad Gesnerus, a great learned man, and a very diligent writer, in all good arguments of oour time (but deceased) in the first chapter of hiz Mithridates, reporteth the same. ‡ Called at that time Killingworth, "but," Laneham adds, "of truth grounded upon feythful storie, Kenelworth." The real origin of the name, is supposed to be Kenelms Worth, or the Court of Kenelm, from the Saxon ꝑoꝛ̓ð a Court.

she dined in great state, and being entertained with hunting on her road after dinner, did not arrive at the Castle before eight o'clock in the evening. Before she came to the first gate, one dressed as a Sybil, in her prophetic character and suitable poetry, directing her speech to her Majesty, foretold a long reign of prosperity, health, and felicity. On her arrival at the great gate, the Porter, "tall of person, big of limbs, stark of countenance, wrapt all in silk, with club and keys of quantity according," acted his part, after a manner so well known to all readers of romance* as well as history, as entirely to prevent our repeating the often told story of this splendid reception; or of the many days of festival and "princely pleasures"† which passed between the 9th and 27th of July, on which latter day her Majesty took leave of this celebrated Castle: it being the third visit she paid to Leicester, but far exceeding all others, in expense, sports, pastime, plays, speeches, and country recreations.

Lord Burghley, we may conclude, was in attendance upon her Majesty on this great occasion, though not a word of it appears in his Journal,‡ but among those who received the honour of knighthood at the Castle, was his eldest son, the Honourable Thomas Cecil;—the others being Henry Cobham, the Lord Cobham's brother; Thomas§ Stanhope, Arthur Basset, and Thomas Tresham; "men of great worship all," as Strype observes.

Though the visit to Kenilworth was sufficient to eclipse all other visits this year, yet her Majesty was upon her Progress for nearly three months, in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, Stafford, and ending at Woodstock. There is a letter extant from Lord Leicester to Lord Burghley, written on the 18th of June, from one of her Majesty's houses, but from which is uncertain; it is conjectured to have been Grafton.—Some parts of the letter are curious:

"My good Lord,—The great expectation I had of your being here before this time hath caused me to be more silent to you than else I had been; but finding your coming yet doubtful (albeit I hope Kenilworth shall not miss you), I will let your Lordship understand such news as we have, which is only and

‡ In the Preface to Nichols' Progresses, the Queen is said to have began this most memorable of all her progresses from Theobalds, the seat of the Lord Treasurer; where, from his Journal, she appears to have been on the 24th of May, his entry being as follows:

"May 24. The Q. Majesty was at Theobalds, and so she was afore July 22, 1572." Of her many visits to this celebrated place we shall have a fuller account to give elsewhere.

chiefly of her Majesty's good health, which, God be thanked, is as good as I have long known it; and for her liking of this house, I assure your Lordship, I think she never came to a place in her life she liked better, or commended more; and since her coming hither, as oft as weather serves, she has not been within doors. The house likes her well, and her own lodgings specially. She thinks her cost well bestowed, she says, if it had been five times as much: but I would her Majesty would bestow but half as much more, and then I think she should have as pleasant and commodious a house as any in England. I am sorry your Lordship is not here to see it, even by and by her Majesty is going to the forest, to kill some bucks with her bow, as she hath done in the park this morning. God be thanked she is very merry; but at her first coming, being a marvellous hot day, not one drop of good drink for her, so ill was she provided for, notwithstanding of her oft telling of her coming hither; but we were fain to send to London with bottles, to Kenilworth, and to divers other places where ale was, her own here was such, as there was no man able to drink it; it had been as good to have drank malmsey; and yet was it laid in about three days before her Majesty came. It did put her very far out of temper, and almost all the company beside so: for none of us all were able to drink either beer or ale here. Since, by chance we have found drink for her to her liking, and she is well again; but I feared greatly, two or three days, some sickness to have fallen by reason of this drink. God be thanked, she is now perfectly well and merry; and I think upon Thursday come sennight, will take her journey towards Kenelworth, where I pray God she may like all things no worse than she hath done here: I hope the better by the good news.

"And so wishing you good health, and alway well to do, with my most hearty commendations, I bid your Lordship farewell. In some haste, ready to ride, this Tuesday towards evening, June 18.

"Your assured friend, R. Leycester."

Lord Treasurer of England, &c."

1576.

Eighteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, began November 17, 1575.

Confusion of dates—Choice of new Counsellors, &c.—Duke of Alençon—Death of Charles IX. Henry III. succeeds—Holland and Zealand offered to the Queen—Wentworth's speech—A subsidy granted—The Lord Keeper's speech—The Queen pays off old debts—Lord Burghley appealed to on all occasions—The Puritans very troublesome—His conduct towards them—Corn act—Barker's Bible—Zodiac of life—Lambard's Perambulation—Death of the Emperor Maximilian—Letter from Lord Essex to Lord Burghley—Death of Lord Essex, and of the Duke of Chatelherault—Death of Sir Anthony Cooke.

We have still to complain of the great confusion arising out of the difference of reckoning either by the civil or historical year; of which we have a very remarkable instance at this time in Strype, an author, whom upon most occasions every writer must be disposed to consult, from his well-known command of original documents, and great diligence in examining them. He begins his account of the year 1575,* as follows: "The Parliament was now sitting in the months of February and March, 18 Elizabeth;"† and again, "The Convocation at this time of Parliament sitting, framed articles, &c."

Now, it is very certain that the 18th of Elizabeth did not begin before the 17th of November, 1575. It was, therefore, entirely at the end of the civil year 1575, that the Parliament and Convocation sat, or according to the historical reckoning, at the commencement of the year 1576. Almost all that follows, therefore, in Strype, from the beginning of ch. xxxiv. to the end of ch. xxxvi. happened before the meeting of Parliament, and not after, as it would appear to have done from the text as it stands at present. And in truth, the Convocation of which he speaks, vol. ii. p. 533., was under the Presidency of Grindal, successor of Parker in the see of Canterbury, whose death having occurred on the 17th of May 1575,* Grindal did not succeed, so as to be confirmed, before the 15th of February, 1575-6, at which time both the Parliament and Convocation had begun their sittings.

Had Strype, or the editors of his works, looked more narrowly into matters, they might have discovered that the account of this Parliament and Convocation should have been introduced where reference is made in ch. xxxvi. to the letters of Mr. Talbot to his father, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and which have since been published by Mr. Lodge. These give a true account of what was actually passing at the end of the civil year 1575, or, as the historical reckoning would make it, the beginning of 1576; and to which, therefore, we shall now proceed.

In a letter, dated January 4, 1575,† Mr. Talbot writes, from the Court, "Matters touching the choosing of Counsellors remaineth doubtful, but daily it is looked for that some shall be chosen."

"I find," says Strype, "among the Lord Burghley's MSS. a paper of his own hand-writing, containing the names of such Counsellors as were dead, and such as still remained alive, and also of such as were thought fit, by reason of their great possessions, to be received into the rank of the Nobility: which I make no doubt was to be laid before the Queen."‡

From the paper thus referred to, it appears, that of King Edward's Counsellors, forty in number, only four remained alive, viz. Henry, Earl of Arundel, Edward, Earl of Lincoln, William, Lord Burghley,§ and Sir Ralph Sadler.

* There is another mistake made in Strype's Life of Grindal, ch. v. where it is said that the Archbishoprick had been void since August, and that the Queen after three months deliberation, &c. It had been vacant six months, when Lord Burghley first wrote to Grindal, to tell him, that on his recommendation the Queen meant to remove him from York to Canterbury. Parker, indeed, was buried on the 16th of June, 1575; and Lord Burghley, in his letter to Grindal, speaks of his removal, as to take place "now at this Parliament," that is, the next sitting of the Parliament, 1575-6; his letter being dated Nov. 25, about eight days after the commencement of the eighteenth year of the Queen's reign. The articles passed in Convocation, may be seen in Collier, ii. 551, who very properly refers them to Grindal, and speaks of the see of Canterbury having been kept vacant somewhat more than half a year, which was the case.

§ The following passage from his Life by a Domestic, may reasonably find a place here. "He [Lord Burghley] was the youngest, the oldest, the gravest, and greatest Counsellor of Christendom; for there was before his death never a Counsellor left alive in Europe, that were Counsellors when he was first made. He was made a Counsellor at twenty-five years of age, and so continued four years in King Edward's time; and was the first Counsellor Queen Elizabeth had, and so continued to the fortieth year of her reign; a long and happy time to live in such

Of Queen Mary's Council, only two remained alive; Archbishop Hethe and Sir Francis Englefield. And of Queen Elizabeth's original Council, six were dead, and seven alive. The former consisting of the Duke of Norfolk, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Thomas Parry, Sir Ambrose Cave, Sir Richard Sackville, and Dr. Wotton. Leaving, the Lord Keeper Bacon, the Lord Treasurer Burghley, Thomas, Earl of Sussex,* Edward, Lord Clinton,† Henry, Earl of Arundel, Ambrose, Earl of Warwick, and George, Earl of Shrewsbury.

Mr. Talbot continues his letter: "Here are Ambassadors out of France, both from the King and from Monsieur; it was a bruit that Monsieur was poisoned, but now advertisements are come to the contrary.‡ He hath referred his cause to be dealt in by her Majesty betwixt him and his brother, the King; how her Majesty will please to deal in it is not yet known, but the Ambassadors make show of desire to be dispatched."

Monsieur, the Duke of Alençon, had privately favoured the Hugonots, partly from a personal dislike to Catherine de Medicis, his mother, and partly to strengthen a party which he hoped might advance him to the throne, in preference to his elder brother, the King of Poland. The Queen Mother discovering his designs, had him arrested and imprisoned for some months, during which Charles IX. died, Henry was made King, and the Queen (his mother) nominated Regent, till he could have time to return from Poland.§ Monsieur escaped, and with his friends went over to the Hugonots, under the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé, and having thereby, as he thought,

‡ The following entry occurs in Lord Burghley's Diary, "Mons. d'Alanson advertiseth by Dr. Dale, that he was almost poisoned with a cup of wine, whereof M. Thorry drinking was almost dead."

§ According to Daniel, Henry was very unpopular in France, being hated by the Hugonots as one of the principal authors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and by the Malecontents, who supposed him to be governed by the House of Guise. But he was the favourite of his artful mother, by whose care and good management, he came securely to the crown; otherwise, a plan was on foot to prevent his return, and place his brother on the throne.

become formidable to the Court, he judged that Elizabeth might procure for him such terms with his brother, as might put it out of his mother's power to molest him further. It would appear that the Duke had proposed coming over to England, from the following entry in Lord Burghley's diary:

"Feb. 2. La Mott Fenelon and La Porte* had their answer at Hampton Court, that during the troubles in France, it was not convenient for Monsieur to come into England."

To proceed with Mr. Talbot's letter:—

"Here is also Sir Henry Cobham returned out of Spain with answer of his message."

Of Sir Henry's embassy to Spain we have the following account in Lord Burghley's diary:

"Oct. 18, (1575). Sir H. Cobham was sent into Spain to impart to the Spanish King the danger of the revolt of his countries of Holland and Zealand to the French; and then he moved the King of Spain to command a surcease of arms to procure a concord; and so the King yielded thereto."

The next passage in Mr. Talbot's letter opens up a new scene:—"Also here is come one from the Prince of Orange, out of the Low Country, with a couple of chief merchants of Flanders, to make offer of that country to be delivered unto her Majesty's hand; and if it will please her to keep it, they will betake themselves to their merchandises, and pay her Majesty such tribute as before they paid to the King of Spain; they also require speedy answer. The Council be all at Court; they sit daily, and the Ambassadors do come to them.—The Ambassadors have had audience of the Queen twice."

The names of these Dutch Ambassadors appear from Lord Burghley's diary to have been St. Aldegond, Paul Buss, and François Malson,† and it is said, that the States offered to become subject to the Queen as their hereditary Sovereign, deducing her claim or title from Philippa, the celebrated Queen of Edward III., daughter of William of Bavaria, Earl of Hainault and Holland.‡

These embassies to Elizabeth, seem to have occasioned no small trouble and uneasiness. "Her Majesty," says Mr. Talbot, "is troubled with these causes, which maketh her very melancholy; and seemeth greatly to be out of quiet.

* "Those two marriage brokers," Camden calls them.

† See the names as reported by Camden.

‡ See Camden, under the year 1575, for a very good account of the debates in Holland about the choice of a Protector.

What shall be done in these matters as yet is unknown, but here are Ambassadors on all sides, who labour greatly one against the other. Her Majesty hath put unto her to deal both betwixt the King of Spain and the Low Country; the King of France and his brother: her Majesty may deal as pleaseth her, for I think they both are weary of the wars; especially Flanders, which, as the report goeth, is utterly wanting both of money,* munition and powder, and therefore hath offered their country to her Majesty." This letter is dated from Hampton Court, Jan. 4, 1575, that is, 1575-6.

It was certainly very difficult for the Queen to know what to do at this crisis; she could not take any of the Spanish provinces under her protection, much less into her possession, as proposed, without an open breach with the Spaniard, and probably with the Emperor; and yet, if she refused them all assistance, the Prince of Orange might be compelled to turn to the French for protection: he had, indeed, some private motives so to do; his principality of Orange being so situated, as in the case of a rupture, to be at the mercy of the French.—[Camden]. She endeavoured, therefore, to alarm Philip, by pointing out to him the probability of such an alliance, or rather submission of the Provinces to the power of France; and sought thereby to help the Netherlanders, by procuring for them a peace at his hands, with a restoration of their privileges. She had had much more friendly communications of late with Requesens, the successor of the Duke of Alva,† than with the latter; but Requesens himself died in Feb. 1576, and was succeeded by Don John of Austria, the natural son of Charles V.‡

* The Spanish troops, indeed, this year mutinied for want of pay, and in their anger and impatience, pillaged and plundered in a most merciless manner the city of Antwerp, to the great loss and discomforture of many English families. This disturbance led to what was called, the pacification of Ghent, in Nov. 1576; and which was confirmed the next year by Don John of Austria, in the "PERPETUAL Edict," named so, one would think in burlesque, since, in the very next year, viz. 1578, he totally violated it.

† For an account of the extraordinary cruelties of the Duc d'Alva, and the Spaniards under him, especially in the plunder and massacre of Antwerp, see Strype's Annals, vol. ii. part ii. anno 1576.

‡ Sir Edward Horsey was sent over to Don John as soon as he was settled in the Government, to represent to him, that the Queen wished him to come to some peaceable settlement with the States;—that if the King of Spain meant to make a conquest of the Low Countries, and to plant a martial government there, that was so prejudicial to her state, she neither could nor would endure it;—that her Majesty would not suffer the States, through desperation, to cast themselves into the hands of the French; and, lastly, to crave restitution of her merchants' goods, and liberty for them to depart from Antwerp.

In respect to France, she endeavoured to deter Henry from meddling too much with the affairs of the Netherlands, as he lay open in other parts to the resentment of the Spaniard; and she sought to procure an agreement between him and his brother the Duke d'Alençon, who was disposed to renew his overtures of marriage, and to visit England for that purpose, his late connexion with the Hugonots appearing to have rather interested Elizabeth in his favour; for though she declined giving any open assistance to the Protestants, or to see the Duke while the civil war continued, she supplied Casimir with money, to bring German troops into France, to help quiet the disturbances, which indeed appears to have had that effect.

Europe, in general, but particularly the Netherlands, seemed to be in much confusion from the clashing of these several interests; and it was extremely difficult to discover how to attend to the overtures of any party, without hazard of serious offence to others.

But it is time to notice the proceedings in Parliament, which began on the 8th of February, and broke up on the 15th of March; this was no new Parliament, but a continuation "post varias ac diversas prorogationes," of that which sat in 1572, being the second session of the Queen's fourth Parliament.* In regard to the business which occupied the attention of this renewed assembly of the representatives of the people, scarcely any thing need to be particularly noticed, except the speech of Mr. Wentworth, for which he was for a short time committed to the Tower; adverting to what had passed in the last session, 1572, he declaimed largely against the use made of the Queen's name, to overawe the debates, and stop their proceedings, especially on points of religion; which latter, indeed, had been interrupted by a deliberate message from the Queen, who not only judged it to be a trespass on her prerogative, but disorderly, without the concurrence of the spiritual heads of the Church; which Mr. Wentworth, as a Calvinist, disclaimed; affirming, that it was to make Popes of the Bishops, to pretend that every thing relating to rites and ceremonies, and ecclesiastical matters in general, should be left exclusively to their judgment and approval; and strongly insisting upon it, that such things were strictly within the cognizance of Parliament. He also expressed great concern that the Queen should have been so ill advised, as to neglect, if not positively to reject, the Bills proposed or passed in the late session against the Queen of Scots, maintaining that it was very hazardous to her crown and person, and an exposure of her faithful Commons, not only to the resentment, but to the mockery of the Papists.

A subsidy was granted to her Majesty, and as it may serve to account for the extreme popularity of this extraordinary Sovereign of England, we cannot refrain from noticing the very gracious manner in which she directed her Lord Keeper to acknowledge the liberality of her subjects.

"Her Majesty, in these your dooings, has noted three things especially and principally, every of them tending much to the setting forth of your benevolence. The first, who it is that granted; the second, the manner of granting; the third, what it was that is granted. As to the first, her Majesty cannot forget, how this grant proceeded from the earnest affections, and hearty goodwill, of her loving and obedient subjects; therefore her Majesty maketh greater account thereof than ten subsidies, and so she commanded me to say unto you. Again, her Majesty remembereth very well, that this grant was made not by subjects that never did the like before, but by subjects that have been, and continued to be, ready from time to time, to contribute towards the necessary charges and defence of the realm; which doth greatly commend and set forth, she saith, this great benevolence of yours. And as to the second, which is, the manner of granting, her Highness noteth two things especially; the one is, universality of consent, and can there be a more universal consent, than when all agreeing and none denying, as this was? nay, her Highness knoweth that before her time, these manner of grants passed not but with a great persuasion, and many difficulties; whereas this was frankly offered, without any persuasion or difficulty at all; the other is, readiness of granting. It is written of benevolence, bis dat qui cito dat, which, her Majesty saith, may justly be applied to these your proceedings—and to the third, which is the thing granted, she taketh it to be as liberal as any heretofore hath been granted; and therefore hath commanded me, yield unto you her most hearty condign thanks, and withal to let you understand, that her Majesty is as willing and desirous to give you this whole subsidy again, as you have been willing to grant it, if the necessity of the realm, and your surety would suffer it."

The beauty of this address is, that it was any thing but declamatory, false, or delusive; this Queen asked for no help from her subjects in the way of subsidy, beyond what the exigencies of the time might seem to render indispensably necessary; she did not like to burden her subjects, wherever it could be reasonably avoided, and when any grant was obtained, through the great care and judicious management of her Lord Treasurer, it was raised with as little pressure upon individuals as possible,* and never squandered to gratify any vain or fantastical desires; being granted for strictly national purposes, it was, as carefully as possible, so applied, and if the public aids proved at any time deficient, her Majesty was not backward to yield up a portion of her own revenues, scorning to resort to such measures as had been but too common with her predecessors; such as the abasing the currency, to the great damage of the realm. On the contrary, having at the beginning of her reign, by the special advice of Lord Burghley, restored the standard, she carefully kept to it.† Finally, wherever credit was given, it was, for the most part, faithfully and punctually discharged and requited; nor was her own credit of more concern to her than that of the nation, as may be seen by the following passage in the address of Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to the House of Commons, on the motion for a subsidy.

"Her Majesty has most carefully and providently delivered this kingdom from a great and weighty debt, begun four years at the least before the death of King Henry VIII., and not cleared till within these two years, and all that while running upon interest, a course able to eat up not only private men's patrimonies, but also Princes and their estates. The truth of this may be testified by the citizens of London, whose bond, under the common seal of the city, of assurance of payment, being usually given and renewed, and which have hanged for so many years to their great danger, and to the peril of the whole traffic, are now all discharged, cancelled, and delivered into the Chamber of London, to their own hands; by means whereof, the realm is not only acquitted of this great burden, and the merchants free, but also her Majesty's credit thereby both at home and abroad, greater than any other Prince, for money, if she have need, and so in reason it ought to be, for that she hath kept promise to all men, wherein other Princes have often failed, to the hindrance of many."*

* Camden relates, that upon complaints made by the Gentry and Nobility of Ireland, of a too rigorous exaction, by the Lord Deputy, of the Cesse, a tax for the maintenance of the Deputy's household and garrison soldiers, she caused the Deputy to be written to, to use more moderation, reminding him of the proverb, that she would have her subjects while they were polled, not to be flayed; expressing also, as some reported, her fear of having it objected to her, as it was to Tiberius by Cato, concerning the Dalmatian commotions, "You, you it is that are in fault, who have committed your flocks, not to shepherds, but to wolves." Of the notice taken of these complaints by the Council, Lord Burghley wrote both to Lord Shrewsbury, and to the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, ending his letter to the latter by saying, that he "thought the Cesse needful, but not in such a strainable sort as it was sought." That the Queen's prerogative had been injudiciously enforced, and that all excess in the demand ought to be remedied.—See Strype's Annals, ii. part. ii. 102.

† See, however, vol. ii. note p. 81.—as the debasement of the coinage was carried farther under Henry VIII. and Edward VI., than ever known before, it may be added to the credit of our own country, that according to Lord Liverpool, in his celebrated work on the Coins of the Realm, the Government of England, generally speaking, has committed fewer errors, and practised fewer arbitrary debasements of the currency, than any other country in Europe.

The Speaker of the House of Commons, when the Parliament was to be prorogued, ventured again to urge her Majesty, in his speech at the bar of the House of Lords, to marry. Upon which occasion the Queen herself is reported to have made a very eloquent and grave oration, "as well uttered and pronounced as it was possible for any creature to do," as Lord Shrewsbury was informed by his sons, who, being Members of the House of Commons, were probably present. The speech is printed in Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. i. p. 120, but D'Ewes not mentioning it, has led some to conjecture, that it was only an intended speech.—See Nichols' Progresses, ii. p. 3; this, however, is contradicted by Mr. Talbot's letter. Strype supposed that no copy of it existed.—See Annals, ii. 532.

It would seem to be beyond the reach of any man's calculation, to estimate the time spent by the Lord Treasurer, in close and strict attention to public affairs, not merely as one of her Majesty's Ministers, but as the ultimate referee upon all occasions, civil and ecclesiastical, foreign and domestic. Strype's Annals of the Reformation, alone, are sufficient to shew, that besides his duties as Treasurer, and at Court, he had on his shoulders, the burden and weight of every Diocese, and of both Provinces. Scarcely a day passed in which some special reference was not made to the Lord Treasurer. He was invoked as a friend, appealed to as a judge, and even solicited in the most respectful terms, by those who were suffering punishment for their detected plots and conspiracies. When well, every complaint, every information, every return or report was addressed to him in London, or at the Court, wherever it might be. When ill, and even so far from the metropolis, as Buxton, in Derbyshire, his opinion was to be obtained, before any nice case of politics or religion, or of the internal government of the state could be settled.

* D'Ewes, 245, 246. This must be received in excuse of the expedients used by Elizabeth of occasionally raising money, by loans and benevolences, and other unconstitutional means; i. e. distinct from Parliamentary grants. There can be no doubt that she did often resort to the purses of her subjects in this manner, but still with the same regard to public emergencies, and the security of creditors. Mr. Hume indeed, in his Third Appendix, inclines to think the Queen's creditors were not very often regularly repaid, and that at all events, they suffered considerably from their money lying in the Prince's hands without interest. It is, however, certain that other writers speak highly of the Queen's punctuality in the repayment of loans, and Sir Thomas Gresham's letters seem to prove, that she often gave such large interest, as to bring her creditors within the penalties of the Statute of Usury. Macdiarmid has considered the subject in his section on the financial policy of Lord Burghley.

This year, in particular, many addresses were made to him, to interpose between the constituted authorities, and the Non-conformists. The latter being very troublesome in the Universities and in the different sees. Strype has entered so largely into these disputes, that it is quite unnecessary to do much more than refer generally to his writings; or indeed to meddle with them at all, except to explain, as well as we can, the exact part that Lord Burghley seems to have taken. That he was not for any severe or hasty measures, is extremely clear from the circumstance, that wherever he could grant time for amendment, or re-consideration, he was willing to do it. A Bachelor of Divinity, of Queen's College, Cambridge, having rendered himself conspicuous, by a total disregard of the customs and practice of the University, as well as of the Church, the Master of the College had conferred with Lord Burghley upon the subject, at Theobalds; and though he had been cast out by command of the Queen's Council, the Chancellor, in hopes of a better compliance, had procured him to be received again, and tried for one year more, telling the Master, that if afterwards he should not conform to the statutes and customs of the University, he should confirm the sentence of deprivation. Such indulgence, indeed, we must confess, does not appear to have had the good effect intended, but it serves to mark the general disposition of a Government calumniated for its extreme rigour, even to the Puritans, which was certainly far from being the case. We have already observed, that there was a considerable difference between individuals amongst the Non-conformists. Some were undoubtedly very learned persons, and though their resistance to the laws was not less obnoxious than that of the less learned, perhaps indeed more so, from the ill example it carried with it, yet they might be judged to be upon the whole more open to reason in due course of time, if treated with some lenity; as seems to have been proved in the case of Dr. Humfrey, Professor of Divinity, at Oxford, the very person who had committed himself, by a positive refusal to wear the habits, some years before, when Sampson, on the same account, was removed from the Deanery of Christ Church.

Dr. Humfrey was this year, by the means of the Lord Treasurer, advanced to the Deanery of Gloucester, having been previously persuaded by his Lordship to conform to the laws; as he acknowledged in a letter to Lord Burghley, containing the following passage: "That he had received his letter, and perceived his care for the bettering of his state. That he was loth her Majesty, or any other honourable person, should think that he was forgetful of his duty, or so far off from obedience, but that he would submit himself to those orders, in that place where his being and living was, and therefore he had yielded."

The rudeness of some, in resisting the Bishops, was wholly inexcusable, and indeed, is not to be read of to this day, without disgust. Thus one, who was lawfully deprived about this time, by Fricker,* Bishop of Norwich, for a total disregard of the ecclesiastical orders in his ministry, wrote afterwards to the Bishop, a letter, which his party thought fit to print for its great merit, in which he plainly tells the Bishop, that the "reins of Church Government (the Bishops continuing), were not in the hands of Christ, but of Antichrist. And that whereas they [the Bishops] shrouded themselves under the shadow of the Prince, saying, that she created them and their authority, &c. He could discourse of that generation better than so: he knew it of a truth, that the Archbishop begat them, and the Bishop of Rome begat him, and the Devil begat him. So now in respect of their offices, they saw who was their grandsire, and who their great grandsire." The rest of the letter is not much unlike the specimen we have selected; but one passage is quite sufficient to shew how little these angry "Preachers of God's word," as they called themselves, had of that wisdom which is from above, and which a truly inspired Apostle has described, as "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy."†

We have now to commemorate a public measure attributed to Lord Burghley, which has continued to operate ever since to the great benefit of both the Universities, and other collegiate bodies; nor can we do this more concisely than in the very words of Strype.

* Successor of Parkhurst.

† See the cases of Rockrey, Gawton, and Harvey, Strype's Annals, iii. b. ii. ch. 4. anno 1576. See also in the same chapter a curious account of an Ordination in the Irish Popish Church, this year, in which no fewer than five bastards, some, and perhaps all, sons of priests, presented themselves, contrary to the ecclesiastical canons, but fortified with a regular dispensation from the Pope, Gregory XIII.

After speaking of Dean Nowell's interposition with Lord Burghley, "the great patron of religion and learning in those days," in behalf of Manchester College, whose revenue had been greatly abused, he proceeds as follows:

"This great and good Lord Treasurer was now also very instrumental to the cause of learning and religion, by procuring some favours to the Universities;* namely, a seasonable act of Parliament for increasing the commons of the Colleges, there having been but slender allowances to the students. It was called the Corn Act, which Andrew Willet, D.D. commemorates with these words: 'The statute of provision of corn for Colleges in both Universities, made in the eighteenth of her Majesty's reign [i. e. 1576], whereby it is provided, that in every lease to be made, the third part of the rent should be paid in corn, for the mending and increasing the common diet. Wheat to be served in at 6*s.* and 8*d.* and malt at 5*s.* the quarter, or so much money [to be taken at the will of the Colleges'], by virtue of which act, the benefit upon new leases, which are actually void, without reservation of such provision are doubled, to the great relief of the company of students; the benefit whereof may arise to the increase of more than 12,000*l.* per annum, in both Universities. This act, saith the before-mentioned author, was devised and procured by the prudent and provident care of Sir William Cecil, Lord Treasurer and Chancellor of the University of Cambridge. I know this Act is attributed by some to Sir Thomas Smith, the Queen's Secretary; but Dr. Willet, who lived in those times, and was then an University man, no question had good information. It is probable, that both the one and the other joined together in devising and procuring it."

This was certainly a great instance of the foresight and penetration of these very able men; who observing how greatly the value of money had sunk, and the price of all provisions risen, by the quantity of bullion imported from the new found Indies (which effects were likely to increase to a greater degree), devised this method for upholding the revenues of the Colleges.†

In the course of this year the Church was enriched by another publication of the Bible in 4to, of which a large and circumstantial account, as usual, is given by Strype, under the year 1576; the Lord Treasurer is supposed to have had no small share and influence in the preparation of this edition of the Scriptures,* from the circumstance, that within the capital letter B, the first letter of the word blessed which begins the first Psalm, his arms and motto, Cor unum via una, are included. In the title-page also, where is a picture of Queen Elizabeth, several figures are introduced; one of a grave Senator in his gown, by the side of a pulpit, where a minister is preaching, is supposed to be intended for Lord Bnrghley.

* One of these favours was the confirming the right of Sturbridge Fair, to the University of Cambridge, for which others had made suit to the Queen.

† See Blackstone's Commentaries, b. ii. ch. 20. who observes, that things have so changed since, that by the operation of this very device, whereas at first the corn-rent was but one-third of the old rent, the money arising from corn-rents now, is, communibus annis, almost double to the rents reserved in money—the proportions have varied considerably at times, since the learned Commentator wrote.

Another book called, the "Zodiack of Life," being a translation of a Poem, by Marcellus Palingenius Stellatus, an excellent Italian Christian Poet, appeared this year, from the hands of Bernabie Googe, and was dedicated to Lord Burghley. "It is a piece," says Strype, "of natural philosophy, and aimeth at the drawing men to morality and piety, and the fear of God; taking his argument from the immortality of the soul, and a future state."

A re-print also of Sir John Cheke's book, "The true Subject," of which we had occasion to speak largely in our first volume, under the reign of Edward VI., anno 1549, was put out this year, in a small 8vo, perused and imprinted by Seres.

It was in this year likewise, that Lambard's Perambulation of Kent was printed,† in which the Lord Treasurer is supposed to have had some hand; the manuscript having been sent to him by Archbishop Parker (see before, p. 21), who had been entrusted with it by the author, and who wished it "to suffer the hammer of some of his friends' judgments," as the Archbishop wrote to Lord Burghley, before he could venture to put it abroad; "by which hints," says Strype, "we may collect the value of that book, which as it had a very learned man for its author, so it had the perusals, corrections, and additions of two other men of learning in antiquity; and they no less than an Archbishop of Canterbury, and a Lord Treasurer of England."

In the obituary of this year, several eminent names are to be found; as, the

* This was called Barker's Bible, the name of the Queen's Printer.

† We follow Strype; Nicholson, in his Historical Library, speaks of an edition in 1570. Lond. 4to. This does not seem to agree with what is said, of the Archbishop's sending it in MS. to the Lord Treasurer in 1573. See before, p. 21; and in which letter, which may be seen in the Appendix to Strype's Life of the Archbishop, No. 89, he says, he is sure the Lord Treasurer had not seen it. In truth Nicholson is wrong, as the Preface to Bolisant's edition, 1576, expressly mentions the circumstance of its having been written in 1570.

Emperor Maximilian, the Earl of Essex, the Duke of Chatelherault, and Sir Anthony Cooke.

Maximilian II. was born in 1527, and elected King of the Romans in 1562; he had procured himself to be chosen King of Hungary and Bohemia, in the life-time of his father, whom he succeeded in the empire, 1564. He was of too mild and pacific a disposition to make any great figure in those days, but it is much to his credit, that he scrupled not to remonstrate openly with those who were for more violent measures. When urged to take a decided part against the Protestants, "He did not," he said, "comprehend how it could be doing any honour to the common Father of mankind, to sprinkle his altars with the blood of heretics." When Henry III. of France visited him on his road from Poland, to take possession of his new dominions, he advised him to adopt milder measures than his brother Charles. "In pretending to exercise a power over men's consciences," he observed, "which God never conferred upon them, Princes are in danger of forfeiting that power which God has really entrusted to them." He was a Prince of a cultivated understanding, fond of books, and a patron of learned men; he married a sister of Philip the Second of Spain, by whom he had rather a numerous family; and the eldest daughter, according to the horrible arrangements of royal marriages, married her uncle Philip; the youngest daughter Elizabeth, was the wife of Charles the IXth of France: we have already spoken of her virtues; she suffered, but in silence; her father had forewarned her of the sad state of the kingdom, over which she was called to preside as Queen, and she prudently learned to conceal her grief, and managed to be spared giving her consent to measures, which she could not but view with horror and disgust. The Emperor died on the 12th of October, 1576.*

The death of the Earl of Essex, had something in it very melancholy; for he held a high situation in Ireland, where he was known to have discharged his duty, like a good, faithful, and brave subject of the Queen, liked by every body in that divided country, even, it would seem, by his greatest opponents, but there were those who wished him out of the way; Leicester had set his heart upon possessing Lady Essex, and it has been conjectured, therefore, that her unfortunate husband lost his life by poison;† at all events, the marriage of Leicester with his widow, afforded very reasonable grounds for such suspicions, considering the character of the persons, the times, and the transaction; especially as Leicester had interested himself to get him sent back to Ireland after a temporary absence, and shamefully repudiated another Lady to wed the Lady Essex, who was a daughter of Sir Francis Knollys.

* On this occasion, the Queen sent Sir Philip Sidney, upon an embassy of condolence to the German Court, and to convey her congratulations at the same time to Rodolph, King of the Romans, on his succession to the Empire.

The very last letter this unfortunate Nobleman wrote, seems to have been addressed to Lord Burghley, and must therefore be copied. It is dated Sept. 25, 1576:*—

"My good Lord,

"It were more reasonable that I framed my last speech unto you to this end, to shew myself thankful for your favours past, than to enter into new petitions at such a time as this, when you are sure that your thanks will die with me; and that my son, by tenderness of years, is far from discretion to judge of such friendships, as I must desire to proceed from your Lordship in his behalf. Nevertheless, upon the assured confidence, that your love to me shall descend to my children, and that your Lordship will declare yourself a friend to me alive or dead; I have willed Mr. Waterhouse to shew unto you, how you may with honour and equity do good to my son Hereford, and how to bind him with perpetual friendship to you and your house, and to the end I would have his love towards those which are descended from you spring up and increase with his years. I have wished his education to be in your household, though the same had not been allotted to your Lordship as Master of the Wards; and that the whole time, which he should spend in England, in his minority, might be divided in attendance upon my Lord Chamberlain and you, to the end, that as he might frame himself to the example of my Lord of Sussex in all the actions of his life, tending either to the wars, or to the institution of a Nobleman; so that he might also reverence your Lordship, for your wisdom and gravity, and lay up your counsels and advices in the treasury of his heart.

"I assure myself in God, that he will raise up many friends to my posterity, and that this small persuasion shall be sufficient to move your Lordship to do good to the son of him, who lived and died your true and unfeigned friend, and so to the Lord I commit you, sequestering myself henceforth from all worldly causes, Your Lordship's bounden and at commandment, "Essex.

"At Dublin the 21st of September, 1576."

* Murdin, 301.

"My good Lord,—I am much desirous that my son* should be sent to the Palsgrave as soon as your Lordship and my Lord Chamberlain should think him fit to travel, but whatsoever I write to the Queen's Majesty therein, I shall submit myself to your two opinions, as I would in all things, if God had given me life."

This is certainly a very remarkable letter, for on the very day after it was written, viz. on the 22d of September, this "good Earl of Essex," as he has been reasonably called, breathed his last in the Castle of Dublin, according to the account of the Master of the Rolls there, in a letter to Lord Burghley, as follows:

"O my good Lord, here I must among others advertise you of the doleful departure of the Earl of Essex; who ended his life, to begin a better, the 22d of September in the Castle of Dublin."—He continued to inform his Lordship,

* Of this son we shall have more to say hereafter.—But we cannot help transcribing the following letter, as justly appertaining to the work we have in hand; though we have been anticipated by Mr. Ellis, who has published it already in the 2d series of his Original Letters.

"Walter Earl of Essex to the Lord Treasurer."—[MS. Lansdowne, 17, art. 23.]

"My verie good Lord, because I have ever found in your Lordship such love and favour towards me as I cannot anie wais fully requite, I have therefore resolved to make you the offir of the most sufficient pledge of my good will, namely of the direction, educacion, and marriage of myne eldest sonne, whome if you can like to match with your daughter I will presently assuer hym two thousand markes by yere in Englande, besides my houses, demaines, and parkes. I will give to your Lordship one hundreth poundes or two hundreth markes by yere for his education, I will assuer to your daughter five hundreth poundes by yere in jointure, and upon the marriage depart with a convenient portion for their maintenance during my lief; yf at yeres of discretion the match shalle not goe forward, I will give to the gentlewoman, to her marriage two thousand poundes, and thus much in behalf of my sonne. From myself you shall most assuredlie look and ever fynde as firme and constaunt friendship as your Lordship shall receive by enie other alliaunce in Englande; to all which pointes I gage myne honour and faith, and have testified the like to the bearer to be utterid to your Lordship, as I do now also confirme it with my hand and seale. Their is equality sufficient in their yeres, no great distaunce in neighbourhood between Tiboldes and Bonington, such an occation might make me like well of my landes in Essex, where if God send me lief I might hereafter shewe all offices of friendship to the good Countesse your daughter, of whose match I mistrust not but your Lordship shall in the end receive singular cumfort. Your Lordship seeth how open and plaine I am; use me as it shall please you: and so with my most harty commendacions to my Lady I take my leave—at Knockfergus the first of November 1573.

"At your Lordship's Commandment, that being about him in the latter end of his sickness, he beheld such tokens of nobility, conjoined with a most godly and virtuous mind, to the yielding up of his breath, as was rarely to be seen;—that two days before he died, he had speech with him of his Lordship [the Lord Treasurer], and said he thought he was born to do him and his good. But now, said he, I must commit the oversight of my son and all to him;—that he spake also lovingly of my Lord of Sussex;—he doubted that he had been poisoned,* but of that suspicion he quitted this land, saying, No, not Tirrelaghe Lunnagh himself would do any villany to his person.—At the last, yielding up his breath, he cried, Courage, courage; I am a soldier that must fight under the banner of my Saviour Christ."

"To the right honourable my verie good lord the lord Burleighe Lord Treasurer of Englande." "W. Essex."

The body of this noble Lord† was brought over to be buried at Carmarthen, where he first drew his breath, and where his funeral was performed with great solemnity, the Bishop of St. David's preaching the sermon.

The following account of the death of the Duke of Chatelherault we copy from Camden:

"There died this year no man of great note in England, but in Scotland a most noble person, namely James Hamilton, Duke of Chastel-Herault, and Earl of Arran; who being great grandson to James the Second King of Scots, by his daughter, was appointed tutor to Mary Queen of Scots, and Governor and Heir-apparent of the kingdom during her minority. After, when he had delivered her to the French, he was made Duke of Chastel-Herault in France, and was after that constituted by Q. Mary (being then a prisoner) the first of the three Lieutenants of Scotland. Whose cause whilst he most constantly maintained, being an open-hearted man, and of a mild disposition, he was perpetually tossed and turmoiled by the vexatious contrivances of turbulent persons."

The death of Sir Anthony Cooke, the father-in-law of Lord Burghley, took place on the 11th of June, 1576, at his seat, Giddy Hall, in the county of Essex. Sir Anthony, to go back to the commencement of our work, was one of the executors of Henry VIII.'s last will, and one of the tutors to his son

* This seems very much to differ from the account in Camden; and, perhaps, as that historian observes, it was but a suspicion of the vulgar (who always suspect them to be poisoned, whom they esteem and love). The testimony of the Master of the Rolls, however, is very strong, and his discharging Ireland from the imputation appears to implicate Leicester.

† He was only thirty-three years of age when he died.—He had a superstitious notion that thirty-six was the utmost limit of the days of the Earls of Essex, and even desired his son to be admonished of this, who indeed did not live so long.—Camden.

King Edward VI. The inscription upon his monument in Rumford Chapel, where he was buried, very concisely expresses his quality, his worth, his marriage, and his family, in the following words:

"Dñs ANTHONIUS COCUS, ordinis equestris miles, ob singularem Doctrinam, prudentiam et pietatem, Regis EDOARDI Sexti Institutor Constitutus. Uxorem habuit ANNAM filiam GULIELMI FITZWILLIAMS de Milton, militis, vere piam et generosam. Cum qua diu feliciter vixit, et supervixit. Ut tandem quum suos, tam natos, quam natas, bene collocasset, in Christo pie mortuus est, anno ætatis, 70."*

The celebrity of his daughters need scarcely be insisted upon. Much has been said of them in our first volume, and more may be seen in the Biographia Britannica, and in Strype's Annals, b. ii. ch. 5. where also an account is given of Sir Anthony's last will, and of his eminent deserts, as one of the restorers of learning, and of true religion, in this kingdom; and more especially, as one who had been particularly instrumental in embuing the mind of that excellent Prince Edward VI. with right principles of religion, and disposing him to carry on the Reformation of the Church, began by his father, Henry VIII., and perfected by his sister, Queen ELIZABETH.

The Queen's summer excursion or Progress this year, seems to have hung for sometime in suspense, as Mr. Gilbert Talbot wrote to Lord Shrewsbury. "Since my coming to the Court there hath been sundry determinations of her Majesty's Progress this summer; yesterday it was set down she would to Grafton, and Northampton, Leicester, and to Asheby, my Lord Huntingdon's house, and there to have remained twenty-one days to the end the water of Buxton might have been daily brought thither for my Lord of Leicester, or any other to have used; but late yesternight this purpose altered, and now at this present her Majesty thinketh to go no farther than Grafton: howbeit there is no certainty, for these two or three days it has changed every five hours. The physicians have fully resolved, that wheresoever my Lord of Leicester be, he must drink and use the Buxton water twenty days together. My Lady Essex, and my Lady Susan will be soon at Buxton, and my Lady Norris shortly after. I cannot learn of any others that come from hence.

* See in the Appendix, b. ii. No. v. other inscriptions and epitaphs. From one it appears that William Cooke, his second son, married a daughter of Lord John Grey, brother of the Duke of Suffolk, and uncle to Lady Jane Grey, Lady Catherine, &c., which may account for Lord and Lady Burghley being styled cousins in the letters of that family, preserved in the Museum.

"I saw the Queen's Majesty yesternight in the garden; but for that she was talking with my Lord Hunsdon, she spake nothing to me, but looked very earnestly on me: I hear her Majesty conceiveth something better of me than heretofore; and my Lord of Leicester doubteth not in time to bring all well again." This letter is dated July 6, 1576.

The Queen, in fact, made no great nor remarkable Progress this year. On July the 30th, she appears to have gone to Havering, having been previously in Surrey,* and from thence, perhaps, made a short tour through Buckinghamshire and Berkshire. In September, Lord Burghley in his Journal writes; "Her Majesty continueth at Windsor." On the 24th of August, Mr. Horsman (a Gentleman in the employ of the Lord Treasurer Cecil), wrote to Sir William More, at Losely, near Guildford, in Surrey, to tell him, it was thought the Queen would not come to his house as expected. He ends his letter, "My Lord Treasurer told me he heard the plague was about Oatlands." This may have hastened her Majesty's return to Windsor.

At the beginning of this year, the Lord Treasurer appears to have suffered great trouble and uneasiness from the waywardness and irregular conduct of his son-in-law, the Earl of Oxford.

We have, in a former part of our work, given some slight sketches of this Nobleman's character, which betokened a high spirit, but not subject to any reasonable control. With great advantages at Court, even as it is supposed, a personal liking on the part of the Queen, he managed to offend her; having quitted the kingdom without her permission, he was sent for back in the most public manner; and his father-in-law Lord Burghley, seems, from the following entry in his Diary (as it is called), to have been obliged to go to Bristol with him, where the Queen was at that time on her Progress, to procure pardon and remission of his great offence.—"August, 1574.—Earl of Oxford returned; and he and I went to the Queen's Majesty at Bristol."*

* Murdin, 776.

After this, his Lordship seems to have gone abroad again, and not to have returned before the 29th of March, 1576; when we find the following entry also, in the Diary:

"The Earl of Oxford arrived, being returned out of Italy; he was enticed by certain lewd persons, to be a stranger to his wife."

Lord Burghley was by all accounts an excellent family man, and bore a great love to his children, this slight of his daughter, therefore, could not fail to give him great uneasiness; especially as the estimation in which Lord Oxford appeared to be held at Court, for many showy accomplishments, might naturally lead him to suppose, that the Queen might be prejudiced by false representations of the case; this seems to have induced him to address a letter to her Majesty, March 3, 1576-7, in which he appears rather to put her Majesty on her guard against false rumours, than in any direct manner to criminate Lord Oxford. The letter may be seen in the Appendix to Strype's Annals, book ii. No. v.—His Lordship, in this letter, professes not to know the exact cause of Lord Oxford's cold and neglectful behaviour, and to doubt whether he meant to accuse Lady Oxford of any misdemeanor, or whether it might be out of mislike to himself. Lord Orford, in his History of Royal and Noble Authors, has ventured to repeat the following story as a solution of the difficulty. "The Duke of Norfolk," he says, "was nephew of this Earl of Oxford, who was very strongly attached to him, and used the utmost urgency of intreaty with Burleigh, whose daughter he had married, to prevail on him to procure his pardon; but not succeeding, he was so incensed against that Minister, that in most absurd and unjust revenge (though the cause was amiable) he swore he would do all he could to ruin his daughter; and accordingly, not only forsook her bed, but sold and consumed great part of the vast inheritance, descended to him from his ancestors."

But Strype had long before disputed this account of things. "It is necessary," he says, in his Annals, under the year 1571, "here to vindicate the Lord Burghley from an imputation given out in some of our later historians concerning him; viz. that the reason of the extravagancies of this Earl, and his squandering away his patrimony, was a distaste taken against his father-in-law, for refusing, when it lay in his power, to save the life of his beloved and entire friend, the Duke of Norfolk, condemned for dealings with the Scottish Queen. And this story is taken up in a book not long ago printed, and from thence in the book called the Baronage of England. Whereas, this is a surmise and imagination, borrowed from the Papists, as smelling of their malice to blur the memory of that excellent wise Statesman. They that know any thing of those matters, know that that Lord did whatever he could to bring that Duke into favour, and did it; until again imprudently meddling in that affair, the treason became so apparent, he was condemned by his Peers; and the Queen would not pardon, since her own crown and life was in hazard thereby."

We can neither confirm nor refute this story; it may be true or not true; but that Lord Oxford was capable of acting as is above represented, we can believe, from the character given of him by different writers. It is but doing justice, however, to Lord Burghley to observe, that in his letter to the Queen, he declares that he had never omitted to do him any good, nor had he even in thought ever imagined any thing offensive to him; that on the contrary, he had been as diligent in all causes* for his benefit, as for his own. As for his daughter, the Lady Oxford, he asserts (which by all accounts he well might do) that he had never seen in her behaviour, in word or deed, or even could perceive by any other means, but that she had always used herself honestly, chastely, and lovingly towards him. "And now, upon expectation of his coming, is filled with joy thereof; so desirous to see the time of his arrival approach, as in any judgment no young lover rooted or sotted in love of any person, could more excessively shew the same, in all comeliest tokens.

"Now when after his arrival, when some doubts were caused of his acceptance of her, her innocence seemed to make her so bold, as she never cast any care of things past, but wholly reposed herself with assurance to be well used by him. And with that confidence and importunity made to me, she went to him, and there missed of her expectation: and so attendeth, as her duty is, to gain some part of her hope."

This is certainly a very striking and high-drawn picture of a faithful, chaste, and affectionate wife, slighted by a richly endowed worldly husband, of fascinating manners, but without principle;† wholly undeserving of such conjugal

* As Master of the Wards.—See also his vindication of himself to the Earl. Strype's Annals, ii. Part ii. pp. 179, 180.

† Strype calls him "a humourist, unkind, and a great embezzler of his estate." "His disobliging carriage, and his wild way of living," he continues, "was a great affliction to the Lord Burghley, his father-in-law, who had deserved so well of him." On which occasion, Sir Thomas Smith, the Secretary, his friend, in the year 1576, wrote thus to him: "That he was sorry to hear of the undutiful and unkind dealing of the Earl of Oxford towards his Lordship, which he was sure, must very much grieve his Honour, since he had such a love towards him from his childhood, being brought up in his house. That his Lordship's benefits towards him, and great care for him, attachment, and yet, capable, as to all external accomplishments, of exciting it. We shall probably find more to say of this unfortunate couple.

The attention of the Court was this year principally directed to the Netherlands, where things were in great confusion, from an extraordinary competition of interests. "Don John of Austria," says Rapin, "came into the Low Countries the beginning of the year 1577 with his head full of vast projects. He was a Prince of a great genius, and of an ambition suitable to his birth. The condition of a subject was to him a burden which he would have been very willing to be eased of. All his views tended to sovereignty. His first project was to make himself King of Tunis; that failing, he thought of marrying the Queen of Scots, and thereby of becoming Sovereign of all Great Britain. Camden affirms he had this from the mouth of Antonio Perez, who told him moreover, that the project had been imparted to Pope Gregory XIII., who approved of it, but that it was concealed from King Philip.* This was probably the subject of Don John's conferences at Paris, with the Duke of Guise. So that when he arrived in the Low Countries, he had two grand designs in his head. First, to subdue the Netherlands entirely: secondly, to become master of England and Scotland. Elizabeth was not ignorant of the first, but the second was still a secret to her."

How long the latter remained a secret to her, does not exactly appear, but from Camden's account, she had information of it before Don John expected. In fact, the Prince of Orange, who had penetrated into these designs, informed her of it, so that she knew all about it when she first sent to congratulate Don John on his arrival in the Netherlands. She had also intimation given her of a design on the part of the Duke d'Alençon to bring an army into the Low Countries, for the purpose of expelling Don John, under a hope, that if they changed their Sovereign, he might himself be chosen.

Lord Burghley, who passed much of his time this year at Buxton, whither the accounts of foreign matters were sent to him by Secretary Walsingham, seems to have consoled himself with the hope, that the attention of France and Spain might be diverted from England in some measure, by the projects on foot, and as to any ill likely to ensue from Don John, who meant evil, he trusted deserved a far other recompense of duty and kindness." And he charged this evil upon his counsellors and persuaders whoever they were, and concluded with this sound advice, "sed hæ sunt procellæ domesticæ sola prudentia sustinendæ."

* Camden says, Don John treated with the Pope about deposing of Queen Elizabeth, marrying the Queen of Scots, and conquering England.

Providence might infatuate his Italian or Spanish practices. But as there were very strong rumours afloat in the summer, of attempts to be made to convey away the Queen of Scots, of which he was informed on his return to the Court, he thought it proper to write to Lord Shrewsbury about it, who was then with his charge at Chatsworth, not only expressing his full reliance on the vigilance and attention of that Noble Lord, but vouching for the quiet state of the country, during his visit to those parts, adding, however, that "although time did try these rumours, for any thing already done, to be false, yet the noise thereof, and the doubt her Majesty had of secret hidden practices, to be wrought rather by corruption of some of that Lord's servants, in whom he trusted, than by open force, moved her Majesty to warn him, to continue or rather increase his vigilance if it might be, so that he might not be circumvented therein."*

This is a very perplexed portion of history, as the historians themselves differ much from each other; Camden, speaking of a treaty which the Queen made with the States, of which Grotius makes no mention, only observing, that she so took her measures as to prevent the States coming to any important resolution without giving her notice: upon which Rapin makes this reflection, "The truth is, it was very much for her interest to order it so, that the war which was only beginning in the Low Countries, should be carried on in such a manner, that Don John of Austria should not be able to execute his projects upon England. These projects were not the chimerical inventions of the Prince of Orange, on purpose to draw in Elizabeth to defend the Netherlands. Strada makes positive mention of them in his history; he even says Gregory XIII. sent a Nuncio to Don John with the sum of 50,000 crowns to be laid out in the expedition projected against England; but that he was forced to use it, in his war with the States."

Elizabeth supplied the States with money, assuring Philip that it was to

* There is rather a remarkable passage in this letter, which may serve to shew the uncertainty of Mary's destination at this time, as far as Lord Burghley's knowledge went. After observing that for his own part he was bold to make small account of the rumours which had so agitated the Court and perplexed her Majesty in his absence, he says, "Surely, in my opinion, although I know many are desirous your charge should be at liberty, yet I see no reasonable cause to move me to think that she would adventure herself to be conveyed away by stealth; both for the sundry dangers that might light upon her, but specially for that being at liberty, if her friends should attempt any thing by force for her against this realm, she might provoke the Queen's Majesty, and the states of the realm to work matter to bar her of the interest which she supposeth she hath."

prevent their desperately throwing themselves into the arms of France. This, indeed, might be one reason, but Rapin observes, "In all appearance, Philip was not very well pleased with these reasons; but he made as if he were, that he might not induce Elizabeth to do more."* Her great object, however, must have been, not to suffer the States to be so oppressed, or the Protestants so entirely subdued, as that either Don John of Austria, France, or Spain, might be able from Flanders, to carry on without impediment or interruption, any designs against England, for that they all severally or jointly harboured such designs, there could be no doubt. In August, Lord Burghley, writing to Lord Shrewsbury, tells him, "Sir John Smith is come out of Spain, who reporteth that the King there hath great lack of treasure, whatsoever hath been said to the contrary: I wish he had plenty of treasure, so as we were sure he had plenty of good will towards us."—Lodge's Illustrations, ii. No. cxviii., at which very time also, Lord Sussex, writing to Lord Burghley at Buxton to inquire after his health, expresses his opinion to be, that the only hope of quiet to England, was to keep the Continental powers as equally as possible opposed to each other; for, that if the balance or equality be at any time broken, so that "one be clearly down and the other set up over high," the burden would be the heavier for England.—Ib. letter cxix.

* Rapin seems to contradict himself here, since it follows, "Whilst Elizabeth assisted the Confederates of the Low Countries with money, under colour of hindering them from submitting to France, Philip returned this favour by endeavouring to raise a rebellion in Ireland. This, it seems, was partly a scheme of the Pope's, who wished to help his son Jacomo Boncampagno to the crown of that kingdom."—See Rapin, viii. 501, 502. where may be seen the whole account of Stukely's strange project, which seems certainly to have received encouragement both from the Pope and Philip. Stukely was armed with Indulgencies by Gregory XIII. to be granted to all who should assist in the reduction of England and Scotland, and in the delivery and preservation of Mary Queen of Scots, as may be seen in Strype's Annals, ii. 191, 192. The Earl of Desmond being the Pope's Champion in Ireland, p. 194. In England, at the same time, much was supposed to be passing, to prepare the Catholic subjects of the Queen for an invasion, either by the King of Spain or Don John.—Of these practices, an account may be seen in Strype's Life of Bishop Aylmer, who had received an account from Dr. Wylson, the Queen's Ambassador in the Low Countries, that there were ten Priests dispersed of late into different parts of this kingdom, and one of these, named Meredith, appeared to have fallen into the Bishop's power, of whom Strype gives a long account in the place referred to. So persuaded, indeed, was this learned Prelate (who was well acquainted with the wiles of Popery) that pains were taking to prepare the Catholics for an invasion and conquest of the kingdom, that he wrote thus earnestly to Lord Burghley upon the subject: "I speak to your Lordship, as one chiefly careful for the State, and to use more severity than hitherto has been used: or else we shall smart for it: for as sure as God liveth they look for an invasion, or else they would not fall away as they do." In fact, about this time, many Papists who did before outwardly conform, withdrew from the Church, and refused the oath of supremacy, and many wavering Protestants were turned to Papacy by the seminary Priests.

The affairs of the Church were in no small confusion this year, from the singular circumstance of the sequestration of no less a person than the Archbishop of Canterbury (Grindal); who had given great offence to the Queen by not obeying her injunctions to put down the prophesyings or exercises as they were called, of which we have spoken before. The Bishops in general were undoubtedly placed in very awkward circumstances, having to watch the Papists and restrain the Puritans; thereby occasioning heats and jealousies, not only among the common people, but the gentry, openly or secretly connected with either of those parties, and many of whom being magistrates, were willing enough to dispute the Episcopal authority, wherever the jurisdictions seemed to clash. The more the Bishops were pressed by those who were thus jealous of them, the more they must have felt the want of a learned Ministry, to afford them adequate support; and Protestant learning, or in other words, Protestant theology, may be said to have flowed in upon England after the termination of Mary's reign, from Switzerland and Germany. Unfortunately, with those who returned from the former country, a strong bias towards a popular government was also imported, which the Queen could not like; and which, in fact, endangered the existing laws. The prophesyings or exercises, might have a tendency to improve the qualifications of the Ministry; but in so contentious an age, and where Protestants themselves were known to be divided in opinion, the hazard must have been very great, of increasing rather than allaying the disposition to Non-conformity. Many of the Bishops had themselves been refugees, and the guests of learned Divines abroad, whose opposition to the Church of Rome, had been carried farther than was the case in England. But as far as the Queen herself was concerned, she had a just right to think that the law had provided sufficiently for the Church, in the careful compilation of a public liturgy, with preaching in the Church by such ministers as were able, and by the supply of a book of Homilies, for such as should be less learned, till by their own diligence and the promotion of the study of divinity in the Universities, a Ministry universally competent should be raised up—and this her Majesty fully expressed to be her feeling upon the subject, and the object of her wishes, in a letter she addressed nominally to the Bishop of Lincoln, but intended probably as a circular for the direction of all the Bishops. In this letter, she speaks of "the presumption of some who by singular exercises in public, after their own fancies, wrought no good in the minds of the multitude, easy to be carried away with novelties, and in a manner schismatically divided among themselves into variety of dangerous opinions, which, for divers good respects, therefore, she judged requisite to be forborne. Letting him know, that she, desiring to have God's people under her government guided in an uniformity as near as might be, charged and commanded him, to take order through the diocese, that no other exercise should be suffered publicly than preaching in fit time and place, by persons learned, discreet, conformable, and sound in religion: and reading the Homilies, set forth by authority, and the injunctions appointed, and the order of the Book of Common Prayer."—It is not right to misrepresent purposes so openly and publicly expressed and avowed; and yet Neal, in his History of the Puritans, has the assurance to say, that "the Queen put down the prophesyings or religious exercises for no other reason, but because they enlightened the people's minds in the Scriptures, and encouraged their inquiries after truth."

Having, in our first volume, given an account of the extreme care taken, in compiling the Book of Common Prayer, in ordaining rites and ceremonies, and composing a Book of Homilies, for the use of the less learned in the ministry, at a time when from the necessity of the case, in the great changes on foot, a learned ministry could not be found to supply all cures, we must confess the Queen appears to have been quite right in upholding the laws, and not exposing the Church to the confusion arising from Non-conformists, bent upon following their own fancies; and, as Barnes, Bishop of Durham, wrote to Lord Burghley this very year, "questioning every proclamation, decree, or commandment, that came forth from her Majesty by advice of her Council, in order to examine and determine, whether, with safe conscience, they might or ought to obey the same;" i. e. whether, being in the ministry, they ought not rather to disobey, or resist such orders and injunctions; for this certainly lay at the bottom of their proceedings. It was the use made of the Churches, for such public exercises, and with the sanction or connivance of the Bishops, to which the Queen so greatly objected; nor should it be forgotten, that there were Papists always at hand, ready if they could, to prevent that very uniformity, which the Queen wished to see established, "as near as might be," as she expressed herself in the letter above cited. Grindal declined to suppress these exercises in his province, and thereby incurred the Queen's displeasure, to a certain extent, by a partial sequestration from the duties of his high station, and which continued till the year 1582.

Lord Burghley, as usual, seems to have been generally addressed, if not consulted, upon all these points; and no man indeed could be expected to have a judgment better informed, upon the questions in agitation; no man knew better than himself what provisions had been made for promoting that uniformity in the service of the Church, which the Queen seemed to have so much at heart; he knew how his old friends, Cranmer, Ridley, and others, not excepting perhaps Bucer and Peter Martyr, had laboured to compile an unexceptionable form of Common Prayer, for the Protestant Church of England, the care that had been taken to settle the faith in Homilies and Articles, and how little they deserved to be disturbed by novelties imported from abroad; and yet, perhaps, no man lamented more than he did, the ignorance and incompetency of many, who, almost of necessity, had been admitted into the ministry;* nor could any man

* From a letter to be seen in Murdin, addressed to Lord Burghley, by Archbishop Grindal, soon after his removal to Canterbury, it would appear that the Lord Treasurer had been inquiring into the dilapidated state of the Churches, in Romney Marsh. As more than two centuries and a half have passed since this letter was written, and the condition of that large tract of land remains as nearly as possible in the same state, it is too curious a piece of local information, to be omitted in a history written not far from the spot, and by an author having an interest there, as incumbent of one of the largest parishes in the Marsh, with a population still below 300. The Church, however, is spacious and in good repair.

"From the Archbishop of Canterbury, February 7, 1576-7.

"Concerning the declined Churches in Romney Marsh, upon the causes alleged in the articles your Lordship sent me, I have been heretofore informed, and have given charge to my officers to see the same reformed, as far as may be by jurisdiction ecclesiastical. Herein has been the difficulty, the law bindeth the inhabitants to repair their parish Church; presuming that the soil is in their occupation, as of reason it ought to be; in the Marsh, those that occupy the soil, dwell out of the parish, and having pulled down most part of the best houses in the parish, they leave only cottage houses, and the inhabitants that remain are only bubulci et opiliones, and never able to repair the Church. So groweth a question, whether the owners of the soil be not chargeable to the repairing of the Church, &c.? wherein the temporal lawyers stand against us, &c. &c. It is a hard case diruere loca sacra extra casum necessitatis.—God keep your Lordship.

"To the Right Honourable my very good Lord, the Lord Burghley, Lord High Treasurer of England." "Edmund Cantuar."

There can be no doubt but that the comparative depopulation of so large a portion of one of the richest and most beautiful counties in the kingdom, must have arisen from the unhealthiness of the situation, which in many parts still prevails to a great and distressing degree; so that be more desirous, probably, of encouraging whatever might be reasonably expected to improve the Clergy in knowledge. So far, like many of the Bishops, he may appear to have been wavering at times, wishing if he could, to reconcile the two great objects, of providing a more learned ministry, and upholding what had been sufficiently settled and established, by the judgment of the wisest of his contemporaries, and the sanction of the laws.

There is a remarkable letter preserved, upon the very subject of Archbishop Grindal's suspension, from Cox, Bishop of Ely, to his Lordship; which, as it carries us back to the very beginning of Lord Burghley's political life, and to the times of our first truly Protestant Sovereign, Edward VI.,* Cox's pupil, we shall copy.

"To the Lord Treasurer Burghley,

"Sir,—I write unto, non sine anxietate cordis; her Majesty adeo indignata suo primo sacerdoti, cujus indignatio mors est. Deus meliora. Sacerdotem vero tam clementem Principem, et religionis sincera fautricem, irritare, fontem lacrymarum merito ex oculis elicit.

"Since the beginning of our acquaintance,† both you and I (God's blessed name be glorified) have constantly, through many brunts, a dextris et a sinistris, persevered, and YOU ESPECIALLY. Now at this pinch, esto fortis, et viriliter age, et confortetur cor tuum.‡

"I understand of late, the matter is touching a conference, which hath been used, or rather abused, and not by public authority established; and therefore not unworthily by authority abolished, which I trust no man doth maintain. But I trust hereafter, the thing being deeply and considerately weighed, her

Lambard's account, which is as old as the Archbishop's letter, almost as well applies to the present condition of things. "It is bad in winter," says he, "worse in summer, and at no time good; only fit for those vast herds of cattle, which feed all over it."

‡ So much was Lord Burghley looked up to by the Bishops at this time, that Strype gives the following account in his Life of Bishop Aylmer. "And when about the year 1577, great fears were in all men's hearts from the joint conspiracies of Popish Princes abroad, and the Scotch Queen's accomplices at home, against the peace and quiet of England; the Bishop, knowing what a great Minister of State the Lord Treasurer was, and what a chief hand he had in the counsels and government, fell to his prayers, and most earnestly beseeched God to give that great Counsellor, 'the eyes of angels, and the wisdom of Solomon;' styling him 'God's great and good instrument in this poor Ark of Noah, in these dangerous times.'"—Life of Aylmer, 183.

Majesty's seeking especially the glory of God, and the quiet and needful edifying of her people, may be moved to have further consideration of this matter; and when the great ignorance, idleness, and lewdness, of the great number of poor and blind priests in the Clergy shall be deeply weighed and considered of, it will be thought most necessary to call them and to drive them, to some travail and exercise of God's holy word; whereby they may be the better able to discharge their bounden duty towards their flock. I trust I shall not need, either with words or reasons, to move your righteous heart to mitigate her Majesty's displeasure and indignation against her Archbishop, who I doubt not will use himself with all dutiful submission.

"I have written to her Majesty after my humble manner, absit ut tam grave exemplum edatur in Ecclesiâ Anglicana, quam tantopere Romana tyrannis infestare et devorare satagit, &c. Thus the Lord Jesus bless you with increase of health, and with all goodness that your heart can desire. From my house at Dodington, the 12th of June, 1577.

"Your Lordship's assuredly, "RICHARDE ELY."*

At this time there came out a translation of the Decads of Bullinger, the worthy and hospitable divine of Zurich, of whom we have often before had occasion to speak. These were practical discourses on the chief heads of religion, and intended, like the Homilies, for the use of such Ministers as could not make sermons for themselves. In the preface to this book, there is so good an account given of the state of the Church, that we cannot forbear transcribing some parts of it.

Speaking of the inability of Ministers, the publisher, a person of eminence, observes, "that the cause of this great want was not then to be disputed. But in very deed, any man might judge how impossible it was for so populous a kingdom, abounding with so many several congregations, to be all furnished with fit and able pastors, and that immediately after such a general corruption and apostacy from the truth; for unless they should suddenly have come from heaven, or been raised up miraculously, they could not have been; for the ancient preachers of King Edward's time, some of them died in prison; others perished by fire; many, other ways. Many also fled into other countries, of whom some there died, and a few returned, which were but as a handful to furnish the whole realm. The Universities were also at first so infected, that many wolves and foxes crept out who detested the ministry; wrought the contempt of it everywhere, but very few good shepherds came abroad. And whereas, since that time now eighteen years, the Universities being well purged, there was good hope that all the land should have been overspread, and replenished with able and learned pastors, the devil and corrupt patrons had taken such order, that much of that hope was cut off; for patrons now-a-days search not the Universities for a most fit pastor, but they post up and down the country for a most gainful chapman; he that hath the biggest purse to pay largely, not he that hath the best gifts to preach learnedly, is presented. The Bishops bear great blame for this matter; and they admit, they say, unworthy men. See the craft of Satan, falsely to charge the worthiest pillars of the Church, with the ruin of the Church; to the end that all Church-robbers and caterpillars of the Church, may lie unespied. There is nothing that procureth the Bishops of our time more trouble and displeasure, than that they zealously withstand the covetousness of patrons, in rejecting their insufficient clerks."—There is certainly a great deal of truth in the above picture of the times.

* So weary was this good Bishop of his honour, that he heartily wished this year to resign his charge, and to that effect applied to his old friend, the Lord Treasurer; pleading that he was now in fine ætatis, and therefore desired, speaking classically, to have his discharge. "You are the only man," he tells the Lord Treasurer, "to relieve me of my desire." His letter is dated from his palace at Ely, the 10th of November, 1577, and he signs himself, "Your Lordship's assured, Rich. Ely. Manu vacillante."

The Lord Treasurer was not inattentive to the unpleasant situation, in which the Archbishop was placed; but after he had been in disgrace for the space of six months, sent a private and kind message to him, as Strype writes, by Goodman Dean of Westminster, to acquaint him with what would probably be the course of proceedings upon the business in the Star Chamber; and giving him advice and special directions under his own hand, how to act so as best and soonest to restore himself to the Queen's favour. But as the paper he had drawn up seemed to call for more submission and compliance, than the Archbishop could reconcile to his conscience, he did not quite accede to its contents, but sent a petition to the Lords of the Star Chamber, in terms submissive enough in themselves, but in no manner acknowledging himself to have been in fault; it is no wonder, therefore, that it had not the effect his friends could have wished, and Lord Burghley had contemplated. What made it so much a matter of conscience with the Archbishop, appears to have been a mistaken notion, that the Apostle's injunction, 1 Cor. xiv. 29. laid a positive obligation upon him to encourage such exercises.*

Strype, in his Annals, under the year 1577, has given an account of the distress and sufferings of a half-brother of the Earl of Sussex, Lord Chamberlain, Egremond Radcliffe, who having early in life been engaged in the rebellion of 1569, had endeavoured to get himself restored to the Queen's favour, but in vain. After being imprisoned in the Tower, for returning to England without her permission, and instead of receiving, as he hoped, pardon for his offences, banished afresh; he was executed in Flanders, by order of Don John, under a suspicion of his being employed to take away his life.† We mention this case, as a fresh instance of the confidence with which every person in trouble seems to have applied to the Lord Treasurer, in preference to any other person about the Court; in this particular case, in preference even to the sufferer's own brother, for Mr. Radcliffe in his several letters to Lord Burghley, as earnestly implores him to get him reinstated in the good opinion of Lord Sussex, as of the Queen herself. As far back as in the year 1574, he wrote from abroad, begging the Lord Treasurer to be a means to my Lord, his brother, that he would pardon his offence, which God knew proceeded of youth and ignorance, not of malice; therefore, he humbly besought his Lordship, even for God's sake, to deal with his brother in it; for that if he persevered still in his indignation against him, he knew it would be his destruction, &c. And to this application Lord Burghley appears to have paid great attention, for in 1575, before he took the imprudent step of returning to England, without permission, he wrote from Calais, to the Lord Treasurer, "that if small benefits did bind good natures, how much ought he to think himself bound unto his Honour, since by his only friendship he had recovered grace at her Majesty's hands, and good liking of my Lord, his brother."

* That the Archbishop was not singular in his interpretation of the above passage, may be seen by the paper introduced by Strype into the Appendix of his Life of Grindal, No. xii. purporting to be a discourse concerning prophesying, from 1 Cor. xiv. 29. "Prophetæ duo aut tres loquantur, &c. Let the prophets speak two or three, and let the others judge." But as St. Paul was writing to the Corinthians expressly, to guard them against confusion in their public meetings, and the prophets he alludes to were expected to wait for a revelation, ver. 30, the cases seem to have been exceedingly different. Bishop Aylmer was much troubled with these Precisians, and wrote to the Lord Treasurer about them; wishing them removed from his diocese of London, to more distant counties, where he thought they might be of use, "to draw the people from Papism and gross ignorance." This was in 1577.—See Strype's Life of Aylmer, ch. iv.

† See Camden on this, p. 226, 227.

It seems, therefore, that at that time Lord Burghley had effectually befriended him, and his own haste and imprudence ruined him afterwards. For in April of this year, 1577, he wrote from the Tower to his Lordship, complaining of his miserable state and long imprisonment [about two years]: praying him, according to his accustomed goodness and consideration towards him, to understand the extremity he was in. And that he doubted not God would so work in his noble and pitiful heart, that he should find, by some suit made unto her Majesty in his behalf, a remedy of his sorrows; wherein he pined and consumed, as one weary of life, and utterly void of consolation. He tells him, that he had no power to compass this benefit, but only by his Lordship's favour and aid: to whom he was already so much bound, as he knew not how he might be ever able to acknowledge the least part of his noble dealings towards him. In May, her Majesty continuing quite inexorable, he writes again to thank Lord Burghley for having endeavoured to serve him with her Majesty; for the which and a number of other favours shewed to him, he rendered his most humble thanks: acknowledging himself obliged to him during his life, &c.

From these letters it certainly appears, that the Lord Treasurer did all he could do for this unhappy man, though he had been in the rebellion of 1569, and connected with the very men who had combined to ruin his Lordship if they could have done it; being besides still a Papist, and a pensioner of foreign Courts; so desirous does Lord Burghley seem to have been of reclaiming and restoring any penitent rebel, where it might be done with any degree of prudence. In this instance, the Queen seems to have mistrusted the prudence of Radcliffe, or perhaps his near relationship to Sussex, and Burghley's kindness, made Leicester his enemy.

It would seem, as if the Lord Treasurer, though advanced at Court, continued to discharge the duties of all his former appointments. He still received as many supplicatory letters from distressed and needy persons, as when he held his first office of Master of Requests, and as many letters on political and state affairs as when he was Secretary of State. We find the Recorder of London this year making his report to him of condemned prisoners; and the prisoners themselves sueing to him for pardon. Of criminals there seem to have been a sad number, consisting principally of the different gradations of thieves and robbers, or in the language of the times, "cozeners, cheats, and cut-purses;"*

* One who was under condemnation at this time, gave information to the Recorder of a design to rob the Lord Treasurer's house, in particular, but it seems to have been a very imperfect story.

receivers of stolen goods, horse-stealers, fabricators of false money,* and dealers in magic.

In November of this year the Lord Keeper Bacon, taking, as it were, a clear but comprehensive view of the dangers with which the nation was threatened, addressed a letter to the Queen, expressly to unfold to her his apprehensions, and to advise her of what he judged to be the best remedies against impending evils. The great powers arrayed against her he represented to be France, Spain, and Rome. France might be expected to attack her from Scotland; Spain by the Low Countries; and Rome by its emissaries amongst the disaffected at home. He therefore strongly admonished her Majesty carefully to look to Scotland, to give support to the Protestants, and before France could gain a footing there by pensions and gratuities, to offer such to the chiefs of the King's party, who would be more ready to receive them at her Majesty's hands, without any sacrifice of their religion, than at the hands of France, with such a sacrifice, and all its bad consequences.

Against the Spanish designs, he recommended a prudent and close communication with the Prince of Orange, in order to discover the best means of supporting the States against the tyranny of Spain, or any usurpations on the part of France: and against the Pope, he urged upon her Majesty the wisdom of giving countenance and credit to all her Protestant subjects, and to have Casimir in readiness to give his aid in case of emergencies.—The whole letter may be seen in the Appendix to the 2d vol. of Strype's Annals, No. vii. b. ii.

Of the Queen's progresses and visits this year, we have to record, that on the 14th of May she was at Theobalds with the Lord Treasurer, and seems to have gone from thence to Gorhambury, the seat of the Lord Keeper, whom she had often visited before, but at this time her visit was the more noticeable, because he had fallen into some fresh disgrace on the old suspicion of favouring the claims of the Suffolk family to the crown, in preference to that of the Queen of Scots; but it would appear, that while the Queen was at Theobalds, Lord Burghley had managed to procure a reconciliation. The expenses of her Majesty's visit to Gorhambury fell very heavily on the Lord Keeper; an account of them may be seen in Nichols's Progresses.—It seems to have been upon

* These were not destitute of the countenance and encouragement, even of certain of the Gentry, in many counties, as one reported to the Lord Treasurer. He offered also to impeach many who dealt in magic, and being then actually under condemnation, he speaks of his (Lord Burghley) having "preserved many condemned criminals to amendment of life."

this occasion that he made that ready reply to the Queen, upon her observing to him that the house was too small for him,—"Madam," said he, "my house is not too small for me, but your Majesty has made me too great for my house."

Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, were the counties selected this year for her Majesty's usual summer Progress, and great preparations were in many parts made to receive her; insomuch, that at some places where she was expected, there was likely to be a great dearth of provisions. Lord Buckhurst, in particular, was apprehensive of being put to difficulties, and absolutely wrote to the Lord Chamberlain (Lord Sussex), to know whether her Majesty would visit him or not, because, if she were to come, he had been so forestalled by the Lords Arundel and Montague, that the three counties of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, could not supply what would be wanted at Buckhurst, and that he should have to send to Flanders for a due supply of provisions.—The letter is dated July 4, 1577.

Lord Burghley, however, was not in the way to attend upon her Majesty before September, having occasion to go to Buxton, for which purpose he quitted Theobalds, July 22, and proceeded to Burghley House, Northamptonshire; thence, by Derby and Ashbourn in the Peak, to Lord Shrewsbury's at Chatsworth, and so on to Buxton,* where he appears to have continued till towards the end of August.

It is remarkable, that in the month preceding Lord Burghley's visit to Chatsworth and Buxton, Lord Leicester was at both those places; and, indeed, received with such singular attention, respect, and hospitality, by Lord Shrewsbury at the former place, as to draw from her Majesty a very particular letter of thanks, being from the form a regular state paper, as follows:

"ELIZABETH,

"Our very good cousin,—Being given to understand from our cousin of Leicester, how honourably he was not only lately received by you our cousin, and the Countess at Chatsworth, and his diet by you both discharged at Buxton, but also presented with a very rare present; we should do him great wrong (holding him in that place of favour we do), in case we should not let

* He was accompanied by his son, Mr. Thomas Cecil.—See Lodge, ii. p. 158. He was entertained at Chatsworth with the utmost hospitality, attention, and respect; the Queen, indeed, had offered to write herself to Lord Shrewsbury, to bespeak his care, but as Lord Burghley wrote to that Lord, he thought "his own credit sufficient for more than this."

you understand in how thankful sort we accept the same at both your hands, not as done unto him, but unto our own self: reputing him as another ourself, and therefore you may assure yourself that we, taking upon us the debt, not as his, but our own, will take care accordingly to discharge in such honourable sort, as so well deserving creditors as ye are, shall never have cause to think ye have met with an unthankful debtor."

On the 12th of August this year, Lord Burghley lost his old friend Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State, of whom Strype has written so largely as to preclude our saying more than that, as an able and well informed Statesman, and many ways learned, he was a great loss to his country.* He was succeeded in the Secretaryship by Dr. Wylson, who survived him but a short time.

* See Camden, 224, 225. and our first volume, where an account is given of the early acquaintance subsisting between Sir Thomas and Lord Burghley. His work on the "Commonwealth of England," is read to this day. For a short account of his successor, Dr. Wylson, see Lodge's Illustrations, vol. ii. p. 250, note.

If we were to take our measure of the public transactions of this year from Lord Burghley's own Diary as it is printed in Murdin, we should not have much to say, for his entries are very few, and none of them of great importance. The first, indeed, relates entirely to himself, and to the inveterate complaint of the gout, with which, at this period, he seems to have been greatly afflicted, and which some new practitioner, it would appear,* had undertaken to cure. In the then imperfect state of the medical art, and the fondness that seems to have prevailed for nostrums, and remedies distinct from all scientific principles, it is a wonder that his life lasted so long, considering the hazards attending any injudicious treatment of that capricious disorder. From letters and papers still preserved, as we have before had occasion to notice, it may be seen how much his private friends were concerned at the bad state of his health, and how eager they were to supply him with any prescriptions they were taught to believe might help to remove and mitigate his complaints; some of them being extremely curious, as indicative of the low state of Physiology, Pharmacy, &c. in those times, comparatively with the extensive knowledge since acquired by modern practitioners,* in every branch of those very curious studies. It must, indeed, have been the general ignorance of these things, that gave scope to the practices of magicians, conjurers, &c. of which some remarkable instances are recorded as belonging particularly to the year 1578, one being detected in casting three waxen images, to take away the lives of the Queen, Lord Leicester, and Lord Burghley; and another who was suspected of having similar designs in hand, by means of conjuration, fell down dead before the magistrate. Foreign physicians also, through the same general ignorance, were able to obtain credit for very simple cures (as the tooth-ache for instance, from which the Queen herself happened this year to suffer), and also for skill in poisoning, which was the case with one Dr. Julio Borgarucci, in great favour with Lord Leicester, (and of whom, as stories go, says Strype, that Lord made great use.) He seems to have been a man of abandoned character, though not on that account the less agreeable to Leicester, who is said to have alienated the Queen's mind from Archbishop Grindal, in resentment of that Prelate's condemnation of Dr. Julio's marriage with another man's wife.—See Lodge, ii. 157; but we ought, however, to add that Strype, in his Life of Grindal, where is a long account of Borgarucci, questions this latter story. Quacks and empirics of all kinds abounded also at this time, with Egyptians and Jews, who told fortunes and used charms.

The next entry is on May 15, and relates to the mission of a proper person [Mr. Edward Stafford] to take account of the levy of forces by the French on the frontiers toward the Netherlands, of whose entry into that country there was great cause to be jealous; of this, however, we may have more to say hereafter.

The Church occupied the attention of the Lord Treasurer at the early part of this year rather more than the State. The Bishops, in their respective dioceses, particularly at the time of their visitations, had such opportunities of procuring correct information of the principles and temper of the people around them, that the intelligence they had to supply from different parts of the kingdom, could not fail to be of great importance to such a Minister as Lord Burghley, "whose eye," may be said to have "been every where," as the most vigilant servant of the State. Had the notices sent to him by the Bishops, been mere matters of information, his trouble would comparatively have been but small, but it was information not to be gathered or communicated without much hazard of ill-will, followed often by spiteful accusations, and very perverse, if not rude opposition. In April of this year, the Archbishop of York fell into no small difficulties of this nature, of which a full account is to be seen in Strype, and which were not brought to a termination, indeed, till nearly two years afterwards; but as he was slandered and misrepresented* at Court, he might have suffered greatly in his reputation, had not "his good friend the Lord Treasurer," as Strype relates, "stood up for him there, and undertook for him, that if the Council thought fit to send for him up to answer this matter in person, he would be able to justify himself, and would be ready at the Council's command to come up."—The Archbishop, he goes on to say, well saw the hand of the Puritans in all this trouble given him, by their suggestions unto their friends at Court. It is very well known who were their principal friends there, and of what power and weight they were; and it must, therefore, greatly redound to the honour of Lord Burghley, that while he was in constant communication with those great and powerful friends of the Puritans, and even with some of the most learned Divines of that very party, yet, that while he sat at the board, the Bishops did not feel themselves to be destitute of a friend, an advocate and an impartial judge, of which this very case of Archbishop Sandys affords us a proof; for when his Grace had fresh occasion given him to address the Council at large, he wrote at the same time to Lord Burghley, lamenting the bad impressions his enemies had been able to raise against him: "It hath created me much displeasure, I hear, but I bear it more quietly, having the testimony of my conscience, that I have dealt uprightly and have given no just offence to any man. I have written to the Lords somewhat more at large to the like effect. I would wish your Lordship should be at the board, when those letters shall be read. Thus acknowledging, how much I am bound unto you, for your honourable constant favour towards me, I humbly recommend your good Lordship to the good direction of God's Holy Spirit."*

* See Strype, as to the particulars; the Archbishop's was a complicated case, as arising out of a provincial, and not a merely diocesan visitation. This brought him into a sad conflict with Whittingham, the Dean of Durham, whose orders he questioned, to the great offence of the Puritans, as reflecting upon their favourite Church of Geneva. Lord Huntingdon, the Lord President of the North, happened to take the Dean's part, which made the latter more bold. This Lord, as well as the Archbishop, made his representations to the Lord Treasurer, but the death of Whittingham put a stop to the proceeding, before the case was fully decided upon.

Another case was communicated this year to the Lord Treasurer, by his old friend Cox, Bishop of Ely, relating to a person of no small notoriety in the reigns of Edward and Mary; we mean the celebrated Feckenham, late Abbot of Westminster; of whom we have often had occasion to speak in our preceding volumes.† This deposed Papist, according to the custom of those times, and to save him the mortification and trouble of a common imprisonment, had, by the Queen, been committed to the custody of the Bishop of Ely, at whose own table he was invited to dine; and the Queen, it seems, knowing the Abbot to be a man of learning and temper, had expressed a wish, to have him brought, if possible, to acknowledge her supremacy, and attend the Church; but he would not be wrought upon, as the Bishop wrote to the Lord Treasurer, expressing on that account a desire to be relieved of his guest, suggesting that it might be well to send him to one of the Universities, to "be examined and tried in open conference, but not as good Cranmer, good Latimer, good Ridley, and others more; from disputations to the fire."‡

But the Dean of Ely, Dr. Perne, wished to have some trial of Feckenham, as well as the Bishop; and he judged, that he had brought him to make some concessions, proper to be made known to the Lord Treasurer, to whom therefore he thought fit to render an account of what had passed. These concessions related to the Queen's supremacy, which in many particulars he granted; to the service in the vulgar tongue, which, if allowed by the Pope, he could very well approve, and to the inoffensiveness of the Book of Common Prayer, which only did not go far enough, so as to include prayers to the Virgin and Saints, and for the dead. But he could not be prevailed on to subscribe any such confession, or to write letters to the Queen, or to the Lord Treasurer, as desired, to acknowledge what he had allowed. But he answered to this effect; "That he was persuaded of a singular good-will, both that her Majesty and his Honour [the Lord Treasurer] bore to him, if he should shew himself any thing conformable. That he thought verily, that if it were not for her Majesty and his Honour, that it would have been worse with him and others of his sect, than it was that day. For the which, he said, that he did daily, and was bound to pray, for the long preservation of her Majesty, and also for his Lordship's honourable estate, but yet he must refuse to subscribe, for if he should yield in one thing, he had as good to yield in all; which, as the Dean told him, was no fair conclusion. For to yield to that, which he confessed plainly in his conscience before God to be true, was the duty of every Christian man; but to confess that which he was not so persuaded of, he would not enforce him to do against his conscience."

Nov. 21, 1578, in which he consults him in a case between himself, as Bishop, and the Lord Thomas Powlet, the Queen being on the side of the latter, "having," as he says, "no other refuge to whom I may resort for better advice."

This passage deserves to be transcribed, as the testimony of a very extraordinary man, at such a time, and on such an occasion; one who, like Lord Burghley himself, had grown up, as it were, with the English Reformation, had seen its commencement under Henry, had taken a conspicuous part against it under Edward, had been in great favour with Mary, and finally, after struggling hard to resist the alterations under Elizabeth, as long as he was permitted to retain his seat in the House of Lords,* was yet willing to bear his testimony to the lenity he experienced under the latter Government, and to acknowledge that what was established, was not wrong as far as it went, but only deficient in those very things, which he could not conscientiously abandon; and which, therefore, we must be allowed to add, he was not pressed to abandon.

What Feckenham, however, could not be persuaded to do this year, he did two years afterwards, having in 1580, subscribed "a true note of certain articles confessed and allowed by him at divers times, by conference in learning before the Reverend Father in God, the Bishop of Ely, Dr. Perne, Dean of Ely, Master Nicholas, Master Stanton, Master Crowe, Mr. Bowler, Chaplains to the Bishop, and others." It may be seen in the Second Appendix of Original Papers, Strype's Annals, vol. ii. part ii. No. 28. In this note he states his reasons for not attend-

In this speech Strype charges him with reflecting very unworthily on the Reformers, Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, Calvin, as well as on our own martyrs, Cranmer, Ridley, &c. He was the last mitred Abbot that sat in Parliament. Camden speaks highly of him, as "a learned and good man, who lived a good while, did a great deal of good to the poor, and always solicited the minds of his adversaries to good-will."

ing the service of the Church of England, to be, first, the want of unity in it; "some being therein Protestants, some Puritans, and some of the Family of Love;" secondly, that the service was not set forth by the authority of a General Council; thirdly, that he could see nothing sought, in our Reformation, but by the spoil of the Church, and of Bishops' houses, and of College lands, "which maketh many to pretend to be Puritans seeking for the fruits of the Church."

For an account of what was passing at *Court in the early part of this year, we may refer to a very curious letter of Mr. Gilbert Talbot to his father, Lord Shrewsbury, dated from Charing Cross, May 3, 1578.

"There is of late come from the King of France, one Monsieur Gundie,† who on May-day had audience in the chamber of presence, and delivered his message to her Majesty, with the King's letter. I hear that the King sendeth him hither to have license to have access to the Scottish Queen, and from her to go into Scotland, and that the King's letter is only to that end; howbeit, I hear her Majesty as yet hath denied him, but whether he shall obtain leave or not

* We have not dwelt on all the particulars to which Lord Burghley's attention was called this year, as relating either to the Church or the Universities, because Strype with his usual diligence has considered them so much at large; but we ought perhaps to notice two papers to be found in his Appendix, Nos. xvii. xviii. The former is a decree in the name of William, Lord Burghley, High Chancellor of Cambridge, for the restraint of excess of apparel among the scholars and students there, said to be drawn up by himself; the latter an address from the Vice Chancellor and Heads of Colleges there to his Lordship, complaining of the impeaching of their free suffrages in their election of Fellows, by letters procured from the Queen. The beginning of the letter, indeed, is so complimentary to his Lordship, that it ought not perhaps to be wholly passed over. "Facile facit Academia quod semper facit (Illustrissime Burleiensis) ut ad tuam semper humanitatem confidenter accedat; ut in omni sua petitione tuam protenus opem sedulo imploret; et in tuo quasi sina omnes suas curas et cogitationes profuse effundat. In quo sane admirabilis quædam elucet humanitas tua; quem neque tua ipsius negotia, neque universi hujus imperii multiplex sane procuratio unquam impediit, quo minus importunitati libenter vacares, et petitioni nostræ amanter concederes. Hac spe freti venimus ad te hoc tempore, sicut ad parentes filii solent accedere." But having had occasion to speak of this address before, under the year 1575, we shall say no more of it here, except that their "loving Chancellor" [so Strype calls him], neglected not to lay their petition before the Queen, and to obtain from her even a promise, that she would be more sparing of her mandamuses for the time to come; such, however, was the influence of others of her Courtiers, that they only became more frequent, so as to give occasion to a fresh address and remonstrance.

hereafter, I cannot tell; but I wish your Lordship would have every thing in such order as you would desire, lest he should come of a sudden, as this other did who is now with your Lordship's charge from the Duke of Ascoyte,* whereof I never understood till he was gone: Mr. Secretary Wylson's man, who is gone with him, is his chiefest Secretary, and held to be a wise fellow: I was but eleven days in town, following the matter of the Burnells, in which time this fellow was dispatched, and so could not give your Lordship notice thereof. For this other, Monsieur Gundie, he seemeth to be a man of great account and port, and was very richly apparelled in jewels this other day at the Court; and if he should get leave, it would be looked for that his entertainment should be very great; and I think there will be some other Gentleman sent from hence with him down, if he go."

"On May-day I saw her Majesty, and it pleased her to speak to me very graciously. In the morning, about eight of the clock, I happened to walk in the Tilt-yard, under the gallery where her Majesty useth to stand to see the running at tilt, where by chance she was, and looking out of the window, my eye was full towards her, and she shewed to be greatly ashamed thereof, for that she was unready, and in her night-stuff; so when she saw me at after dinner, as she went to walk, she gave me a great fillip on the forehead, and told my Lord Chamberlain, who was the next to her, how I had seen her that morning, and how much ashamed thereof she was. And after, I presented unto her the remembrance of your Lordship's and my Lady's bounden duty and service; and said that you both thought yourselves most bounden to her for her most gracious dealing towards your daughter, my Lady of Lennox; and that you assuredly trusted in the continuance of her favourable goodness to her and her daughter:† and she answered that she always found you more thankful than † Elizabeth Cavendish, daughter of the Countess by a former husband, had married in 1574, Charles Stuart, younger son of the Earl of Lennox, and brother of Darnley. His descent from Henry VII. through his mother, and near relationship to James VI. excited some jealousies in the mind of Elizabeth, and caused a temporary suspension of her favour towards the Earl and Countess. In Lodge's Illustrations of History, vol. ii. No. xcviii. is a letter from the Earl to Elizabeth, deprecating her displeasure, and accompanied with one to Lord Burghley, to implore his mediation, concluding, "No man is able to say so much as your Lordship of our service, because you have so carefully searched it." It is remarkable, as Mr. Lodge has observed, that Mary should

In regard to foreign affairs this year, it must have been extremely difficult to decide what might be the wisest course for Elizabeth to pursue. In the year preceding, the Lord Keeper, as we have shewn, took the pains of communicating to her Majesty in writing, his thoughts upon the aspect of affairs, and the dangers that threatened from France, Spain, and Rome; and we shall find that in the month of August, of the year 1578, she had a similar address made to her by the Earl of Sussex, from his house at Bermondsey. This letter, indeed, which may be seen in Lodge, ii. No. cxxvi, related chiefly to the marriage on foot between her Majesty and the Duke of Anjou; but being written in consequence of a particular communication he had had with a French agent of that Duke, it discovers a good deal of the complicated state of things on the other side of the water, particularly as regarded the Netherlands, whither the Duke of Anjou was prepared to lead an army, but for what purposes, remained to be known. The agent, with whom Lord Sussex conferred, told him that at that time the Duke was willing to be governed entirely by the Queen, but that his condition had been rendered so uneasy in France by the jealousies of his mother, and brother, King Henry III., that he was compelled to look out for a settlement elsewhere; or, in the very words reported by Lord Sussex, "to seek greatness abroad, to continue thereby his greatness and surety at home;" which Lord Sussex understood to imply, that he had determined to make himself great, either by marrying her Majesty, or obtaining possession of the Low Countries, or both; in which, he have been suspected of promoting this match with a Lennox. The unfortunate Lady Arabella Stuart was the issue of this marriage. It appears from Strype's Life of Bishop Aylmer, that in the course of this year, the Queen of Scots was reported to have been attacked by the palsy. P. 28, 29.

was likely to be assisted rather than prevented, by his brother's Court, through the desire they had to get him removed from France. But if the Queen should decide to put him from the hope of accomplishing either of these purposes, that he would then assuredly join himself to Don John of Austria, and cultivate a friendship with the King of Spain, to the utter ruin and subjection of the States; and that in this case also, the French would wink at his proceedings, for the sole end of keeping him occupied from home. Instead of venturing upon any positive or direct advice, his Lordship appears to have fallen exactly into Lord Burghley's method, or the method of the times, of discussing the "commodities and incommodities," of whichever decision her Majesty might come to, on these three several points; namely, of the marriage; of the alienation of the Low Countries; and of the French assisting Don John.

As the letter* may be read in the place we have referred to, it is not necessary to dwell upon it any longer at present; our only object being to shew the extreme perplexity of the politics of Europe at this time, and how difficult a part Elizabeth had to act, in order, if possible, to prevent the Low Countries falling entirely into the hands of some bad and too powerful neighbour, whether French or Spanish. One of those, however, who was supposed to be actuated by personal motives of the most dangerous tendency to her repose, was in the course of the year removed by death; we mean Don John of Austria, who died

* Lord Sussex suffered no small vexation this year, from the practices of Lord North, a creature of Leicester's, and of whom we have had occasion to speak before. In November, Sussex wrote to Lord Burghley to communicate his suspicions of that Lord's dealings with the Queen, knowing that he had said he would be stronger at Court than Sussex; who thus expresses his indignation to Lord Burghley, in a style characteristic of the times: "Therefore, my Lord, to be plain with you, if he come to the Court before he be made to know his fault, I will either forbear to come there, or if I do come, I will come in such suit as I will not fear partakers against me; which perhaps may offend her Majesty, whereof I would be very sorry, and yet my honour driveth me to it.—My paper is little; your Lordship is wise; and therefore I trust this shall suffice to your Lordship as my good Lord, to understand my meaning, and so I take my leave of your good Lordship.—Your most assured, Sussex." On the very next day, viz. November 5, 1578, he wrote to Lord Burghley again on the same subject, and in the same highly indignant and spirited manner; and concludes his letter, with lamenting that Lord Burghley himself had been evil spoken of, adding, "And truly, my Lord, whosoever they be, or wheresoever it toucheth, I rest at your devotion, with heart and hand to stand by you as by myself, and upon all occasions to stick as near to you, as your shirt is to your back. And so I take my leave of your good Lordship."—Lodge, ii. 199. from the Cecil Papers.

on the first day of October, in the camp near Namur, in the height of his glory, being only in the 32d year of his age; of which Lord Burghley sent an account to Lord Shrewsbury as soon as the news arrived, in the following words: "By letters received within these three hours,* at London, I am certainly advised that Don John de Austria is dead of the plague, and the Duke of Parma chose Lieutenant;" which we copy, because in his Lordship's Diary in Murdin, his death is imputed to another disorder.† The arrival of the Duke of Parma, the celebrated Alexander Farnese, with an army of Spaniards early in the year, had induced Don John to break through all the engagements he had entered into, by the misnamed Perpetual Edict, and to resume offensive operations; and a great victory he obtained at Gemblours, produced so general an alarm throughout the provinces, as to incite them to apply for aid in all directions; to the Queen of England, the Duke of Anjou, and the German Princes. The former, as we have shewn, sent money; the second agreed to lead an army to their assistance; and Casimir, the son of the Elector Palatine, with the aid of English gold, passed the Rhine with a considerable army‡ of German Protestants;—but the States were not satisfied with the confederates they had chosen. The Protestants under Casimir offended the Catholics, and led them to renew their allegiance to Don John; and the Walloons, who had previously agreed to receive the Duke of Anjou, resisted his entrance; the several States were at variance among themselves on the ground of religion, and occasioned great embarrassment to the Prince of Orange; even the Duke of Anjou refused to join the army of the States, unless Prince Casimir withdrew, and thus contributed to add to the confusion: the death of Don John, and the succession of the Duke of Parma, altered the course of things.

About the time that Don John died, Sebastian, King of Portugal, lost his life in Africa, as Lord Burghley informed Lord Shrewsbury, in the very letter in which

* The letter is dated from Theobalds, 8th of October, 1578.

† Poison also has been assigned as another cause of his death; and two Englishmen (Radcliffe and Grey) executed for avowing such a design, as the Spaniards alleged; but as this was contradicted by the English who attended them in their last moments, we should be much more inclined to suspect (if his death were not natural) his unfeeling brother of Spain, who was indeed suspected at the time.

‡ In the month of June, this Prince published a manifesto, in German and Latin, setting forth the causes which led him to undertake the expedition. It may be seen in Strype's Annals, ii. 161.

he spake of the former event: "The report of the death of Sebastian, King of Portugal, and of two kings of Fez is true; a Cardinal named Henry, of the age of sixty-seven, is to succeed, but he dare not take possession of the crown until the Pope shall license him." Sebastian was killed at the battle of Alcazar, August 4, 1578, in a foolish and romantic expedition, undertaken to re-instate Muley Mahomet, the dethroned Emperor of Morocco. Muley Mahomet himself also was killed, and his rival the usurper died of a fever during the engagement. These were the "two kings of Fez," to whom Lord Burghley alludes in his letter. Sebastian was preparing to take the command of a force of Spaniards and Portuguese, to be sent against Elizabeth; and it is remarkable that Stukely, who had undertaken to conduct them to the conquest of Ireland, under a commission from the Pope and Philip of Spain, and who had actually sailed from Civita Vecchia, with an Italian fleet for that purpose, should have entered the Tagus just as Sebastian was preparing to set sail for Africa; and being persuaded to accompany the King, with the consent of Philip, was one of those who, as well as Sebastian, fell in the battle of Alcazar.—Philip, having an eye to the succession of Portugal after the Cardinal Henry, who took the crown upon Sebastian's fall,* totally relinquished the project of conquering Ireland, much to the disappointment of Gregory XIII., and greatly to the annoyance of the Spanish Government in the Netherlands, who, being unsupported, could no longer resist the efforts of the Prince of Orange, to secure the emancipation of that oppressed country.—See Turner's Reign of Elizabeth, ii. 241, and note 19.

In the obituary of the year 1578, we ought perhaps to include the death of Lord Burghley's very eminent relative, the Lord Keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon; and of the Lady Mary, daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, and sister of the unfortunate Lady Jane Grey. As the former, however, took place on February 20th, 1578-9, it may be considered as belonging rather to the year ensuing. It is not material, however, to insist much in this instance upon the diversity of reckoning, as it regards only an individual; and one of whom so much has been collected and recorded, by others, that it would be a waste of time and writing, to do more than refer to such authorities; particularly Mallet's Life of the Lord Keeper Bacon, and the Biographia Britannica, which in some instances corrects the former.*—We proceed to the Queen's Progresses this year. We have already spoken of her visit to the Lord Treasurer in May, and of her abode there three or four days; from thence it appears that, making two short visits in her way, she proceeded to Wanstead, then in the possession of Lord Leicester; where she was entertained by a dramatic interlude composed for the occasion, by his Lordship's nephew, the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney, which may be seen in Nichols's Progresses, and is printed at the end of the early editions of the Arcadia, The subject is a contention between a Forester and a Shepherd, for the MAY-LADY.

In July her Majesty was at Hunsdon, and purposing to pass from thence to Sir Ralph Sadler's, Lord Burghley, who remained at Theobalds, wrote to Randolph, in attendance on the Queen, to say that as his house lay in the way, he should much wish to have the Scottish Ambassador, who was come to wait upon her Majesty, to dine with him on his road, and to see his house, as he had been informed he had a desire to do (for a fame went, says Strype, of my Lord's splendid buildings there). Lord Hunsdon, it seems, had promised to meet him there, and the Queen was privy to the invitation.†

One of the Queen's chief resting-places on this rather memorable Progress was Audley-End, where the University of Cambridge waited on her, with speeches and disputations;‡ the subjects of the latter being previously submitted to Lord Burghley as Chancellor, who approved of one of the questions, but doubted about the other. The University had prepared a book also to be presented to her Majesty, which Lord Burghley requested might have "no savour of spyke," her Majesty disliking such strong scents; and which the bookbinders, it appears, were very apt to use as a perfume. The book to be presented was, as it is said, Robert Stephens's first edition of the New Testament in Greek.

For the particulars of the attendance of the University at Audley-End, we feel compelled to refer the reader to Mr. Nichols's book of her Majesty's Progresses, as it would far exceed our limits to attempt to transcribe what is there so copiously recorded. Lord Burghley's close connexion, as Chancellor, with all that passed, would otherwise have induced us to give a detailed account of this curious ceremony, but in the work referred to, as nothing seems to be omitted, we may surely reasonably be excused a repetition of what, in these days, is not altogether so engaging or interesting as it must have been at that time. Perfumed gloves seem to have been the rarest and most costly presents the University had to bestow; her Majesty appears to have been much struck with those she received, and Lord Burghley himself had the honour of having a pair given to him in the name of the whole University, of the value of 20*s.* whereon were his arms worked in colours, and verses annexed to them. Lord Leicester, as High Steward, had also the same,* with some others of the Court. In the disputations, Lord Burghley took upon him the office of Moderator, and often interposed, saying, "Loquorut Cancellarius, disputa dialecticè et syllogisticè."

From Audley-End her Majesty passed into Suffolk and Norfolk, where she was in all parts most courteously received, and splendidly entertained, as may be seen in the often-cited Book of Progresses, by Mr. Nichols, a work neither to be copied or abridged; nor, indeed, would these summer progresses of her Majesty fall very regularly within the scope of our researches, if Lord Burghley had had less to do with them than appears to have been the case; but he was generally one of the company, and at her Majesty's right hand; nor is it out of our way to notice the effect of her Majesty's good government of the country with the aid of his wise counsel,† since the loyalty displayed on these occasions was so great as to lead one who wrote at the time, to observe, "what well affected subjects the Queen's Majesty hath within her dominions: to whom

* The verses were generally puns on their arms, mottos, and crests.

† In one of the speeches made to her Majesty on her departure from Norwich, the following short notice is taken of the great care of her Counsellors to espy dangers at a distance, and effectually guard against them; to disappoint and frustrate secret snares and concealed practices, and to suppress all rebellious enterprises with the least possible tumult and disturbance, and that for the space of twenty years:—

"Quid enim referam viginti jam totos annos in tanta nos pace, tanta tranquillitate vixisse, quantum non solum hæc ætas nunquam vidit, sed ne omnium quidem seculorum ac gentium annales vetustatisque monumenta memoriâ prodiderunt! quid commemorem longe velut a speculo prospectas tempestates, prævisa simul et anticipata consilio gravissima pericula, clandestinas insidias non tam vi quam arte obrutas, omnes denique nefarios conatus maximo cum applausu extinctos, nullo aut sane perexiguo motu populari?"

goods, lands, friends, kindred, or life, none of these severally, nor all jointly, are so precious and dear, but for her sake, they can find in their hearts to esteem them as dung."*

There was certainly something very extraordinary in the cordiality of these receptions, especially considering the great trouble and expense of them; at Norwich particularly, as one described matters, "the Prince had her pleasure, the Nobility their desire, the whole train such entertainment, as for the time of her continuance there, Norwich seemed (if any such there be) a terrestrial paradise—but when the frowning Friday followed, which called her Majesty thence, I leave the dolour there was, to the report of them that did see it."† And yet her Majesty was travelling all this while through a county, not long past in a state of rebellion, and not likely to be in good humour either with herself or her company, if the unfortunate but imprudent Duke of Norfolk had appeared to have been punished beyond his deserts; indeed, one of the visits she paid was to the son and heir of that very Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, who, we

* Amidst the fooleries of the mythological shows and devices prepared for the occasion by some of the proficients in the art (of whom three are very remarkable, Ferrers, Goldingham, and Churchyard), her Majesty was, with great propriety, shewn the different processes of the woollen manufactures, for which Norwich was already celebrated; and she had the satisfaction of receiving a particular address from the Minister of the Dutch Church settled there, for the behoof of the Protestant refugees from Holland and Flanders, who, being driven from home by Spanish tyranny, had been hospitably received in England, and under the Queen's immediate patronage encouraged to take up their abode in England, to the great advancement and improvement of our own manufactures.

† See the letter to Sir Owen Hopton, Nichols, ii. 137.—The Queen's approach to Norwich is well described by an eye-witness:—"Within one hour or little more after the attendance of the city officers, who went to meet her Majesty, she came, says the Reporter, in such gracious and princely wise, as ravished the hearts of all her loving subjects, and might have terrified the stoutest heart of any enemy to behold. Whether the Majesty of the Prince, which is incomparable, or joy of her subjects, which exceeded measure, were the greater, I think would have appalled the judgment of an Apollo to define.—The acclamations and cries of the people to the Almighty God for the preservation of her Majesty rattled so loud, as hardly for a great time could any thing be heard: but at last, as every thing hath an end, the noise appeased; and the Mayor saluted her Highness with the oration following." With every allowance that can be made for flattery or compliment, an eye and ear witness of such a scene must have committed himself, had he gone beyond the truth in his public relation of so extraordinary an exhibition. The Mayor's speech, which was in Latin, serves to shew, that her Majesty's visit was in consequence of a petition, or rather repeated earnest petitions from the citizens, that they should receive that honour. "Post longam spem et ardentissima vota," is the expression; which was rendered petitions at the time.

are told, "did shew most sumptuous cheer, in whose park were speeches well set out, and a special device much commended." His Lordship, as Collins tells us, was "a most zealous Roman Catholic" into the bargain, which bespeaks the greater confidence in his loyalty on the Queen's part, whatever other feelings might interfere; at all events, it ought to make us cautious how we pretend to judge of the actual feelings of individuals, either in regard to public or private transactions, in a state of society so entirely different from any thing to which we have been accustomed. Lord Burghley has been particularly accused of dealing treacherously and unkindly by the Duke of Norfolk, and yet, previous to his execution, that unhappy Nobleman commended his children in a very remarkable manner to the care and guardianship of the Lord Treasurer; and even on this Progress, though the Queen, in some instances, seemed to place a confidence in her Catholic subjects, certain severities took place which have been differently accounted for; one, at whose house even she had been received and entertained, was soon after cast into prison, and what was accounted an idol (intended for an image of the Virgin) burnt by the Queen's command. This person was the owner of Euston Hall, and the particulars are to be found in a letter addressed to the Earl of Shrewsbury, by the celebrated hunter of recusants, Topclyffe.*—Some passages we shall transcribe. After speaking of the Queen's health on the Progress, he writes, "The next good news (but in account the highest), her Majesty has served God with great zeal and comfortable examples; for by her counsel two notorious Papists, young Rookwood (the Master of Euston Hall, where her Majesty did lye upon Sunday now a fortnight), and one Downes, a Gentleman, were both committed, the one to the town prison at Norwich, the other to the county prison there, for obstinate Papistry, and VII. more Gentlemen of worship were committed to several houses in Norwich as prisoners." In some accounts, these severities are said to have been inflicted upon them merely because they were Papists; and the Queen's conduct is arraigned in no measured terms, for so unfeeling a requital of the hospitality with which she had been treated. But we are inclined to suspect that some deception had been practised on her Majesty, from the following passage in the same letter:—

"This Rookwood is a Papist of kind newly crept out of his late wardship. Her Majesty, by some means I know not, was lodged at his house, Euston, far unmeet for her Highness, but fitter for the blackguard. Nevertheless (the Gentleman brought into her Majesty's presence by like device) her excellent Majesty gave to Rookwood ordinary thanks for his bad house, and her fair hand to kiss; after which it was braved at; but my Lord Chamberlain, nobly and gravely understanding that Rookwood was excommunicated for Papistry, called him before him; demanded of him how he durst presume to attempt her real presence, he, unfit to accompany any Christian person: forthwith said, he was fitter for the stocks; commanded him out of the Court, and yet to attend her Council's pleasure; and at Norwich he was committed."

* So noted was this person in the ungracious department alluded to, that to hunt a recusant was called Topclyfficare.

It is easy to collect from this, that Rookwood was not committed for mere Papistry, but for some indiscretions betokening a contempt of the Court, which the Lord Chamberlain was moved to resent. He appears to have drawn the Queen to his house, rather to insult than honour her, if not worse,* and to have made a mockery of her very Courtiers. He had evidently been in hold before, and incurred a sentence of excommunication, for extreme obstinacy; and if the conjecture of Mr. Lodge be true, that this was probably the same Rookwood who suffered death in 1605, for his concern in the Gunpowder-plot, we may surely conclude that he was no common recusant, but a very bold and dangerous one, and in association with other suspicious persons at the very time. And it should always be remembered, that the offence of recusancy became much greater after, than before the Pope's excommunication of the Queen, prior to which, Papists had little or no objection, in conformity with the laws, to attend the Church, where, indeed, there was scarcely any thing to be heard or seen, that

* It was in her way to Norwich, that her Majesty was lodged at Euston, and in the verses addressed to her in that city, I find two lines plainly intimating some design on foot against her, on her way thither.

> Ne captum Princeps continuaret Iter.

Which were thus Englished at the time:

> A thousand dangers and delays the Papists had devised,
> To thende our Princesse should abridge her Progresse enterprisde.

Mr. Hallam, who copies Topcliffe's letter in his Constitutional History of England, as "an almost incredible specimen of ungracious behaviour towards a Roman Catholic Gentleman," possibly had not considered the probability of a snare being laid for the Queen, as the ground of such behaviour:—ungracious enough it was, at all events, but we think it may not have been fully understood.

could offend them, the great difference between that and their own Church consisting chiefly in omissions. At all events, it must be known, that the Queen had in her Court, those who, upon the Puritanical principle,* were ready so entirely to confound indulgence to Papists with Papistry itself, that her Majesty herself could not escape the imputation; our own idea is, that both Papists and Puritans might have lived under her Government, in much greater, if not in perfect quietness, had they in all instances, where they could not conscientiously comply, forborne to question the authority of the laws, and incite resistance; but between the two, it was extremely difficult to find a middle course that might afford the slightest prospect of general satisfaction.

We shall end, therefore, our account of these mysterious proceedings, with the following passage from Lord Bacon's short tract In Felicem Memoriam Elizabethæ Angliæ Reginæ.† He had as fair means as any man of knowing the truth, and wrote it when there were many yet alive to contradict him had he falsified facts; nor does he deny, what certainly must be allowed to have occurred, particular instances of great severity; he merely attempts to vouch for certain distinctions, which others have as strongly asserted. "Quod ad moderationem in religione attinet, hærere videbimur, propter legum in subditos religionis pontificæ latarum severitatem: sed ea proferemus, quæ nobis et certo nota et diligenter notata sunt. Certissimum est, hunc fuisse istius principis animi sensum ut vim conscientiis adhibere nollet, sed rursus, statum regni sui prætextu conscientiæ et religionis in discrimen venire non permitteret. Ex hoc fonte, primum duarum religionum libertatem et tolerationem auctoritate publica in populo animoso et feroce, et ab animorum contentione ad manus et arma facile veniente, admittere, certissimam perniciem judicavit. Etiam in novitate regni, cum omnia suspecta essent, ex præsulibus ecclesiæ, quodam magis turbidi et factiosi ingenii, auctoritate legis accedente, sub custodia libera habuit: reliquis utriusque ordinis, non acri aliqua inquisitione molesta, sed benigna conniventia, præsidio fuit. * The writer of the above letter was evidently a Puritan, as may be seen by his notice of the liberty granted to the good preachers who had been commanded to silence, for a little niceness, and by his ridicule of the French Ambassadors, whom he calls "Monsieurs youths;" the Puritans being so adverse to the match with the Duc d'Anjou, which they were come to solicit.

† His Lordship's near relationship to Lord Burghley, or rather to Lady Burghley, renders it the more appropriate.

tertium regni sui annum, rerum commutatio facta est." This charge he wholly attributes to the inordinate ambition of the Spaniard to make a conquest of England, and the insidious designs and efforts of the Pope and his emissaries, to prepare the way for him, by alienating the minds of the Queen's Popish subjects, and by virtue of the Bull of Excommunication, totally absolving them from all their bonds and vows of allegiance; but the whole paper deserves to be read and considered.*

The attention of Lord Burghley this year would appear to have been in a great measure divided between the negotiations on foot for the Queen's marriage, and some very unpleasant disputes relating to the Church, or rather, among the Prelates and other dignitaries of the Church; which must have occasioned him great trouble and uneasiness. Before we proceed, however, to notice these transactions, on which Strype, with his usual care, has written very largely, it may be proper to mention a visit paid to the Court by Duke Casimir; Strype having spoken of it in a manner likely to mislead the reader, from the very confusion of dates to which we have so often referred, and which seems even to have baffled the care and general accuracy of that indefatigable historian.

At the very beginning of the year 1578, he writes, "Duke John Casimir, son of the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, was now come to the English Court." "He was highly favoured by the Queen when he came, and at his departure, which was in February, 1578, she presented him (by the desire of her Ministers) with two cups of gold" (of greater value, it may be observed, than her Majesty quite liked). He mentions other very sumptuous presents he received from divers of the Nobility,* speaks of the obligations he lay under to England, of his great zeal for the advancement of true religion, and concludes with an account of a manifesto he put forth "in the month of June this year," written both in German and Latin, shewing upon what great reason he undertook his expedition into the Low Countries; and which manifesto, indeed, bore date June 22, 1578.

The mistake is this;† Duke Casimir did not come into England till seven months after the publication of the above manifesto, nor till some time after the failure of the expedition to which it alludes; in fact, not till January of the year 1578-9 or 1579, when he probably, as Camden remarks, took the journey on purpose to explain to the Queen and Government the causes of that failure, for it was with the money of England that he had been enabled to undertake it. That his explanation of matters was well received, we may conclude from the extraordinary attentions shewn him. He was even complimented with the order of the Garter, which the Queen herself buckled on his leg.‡ He was conducted into London from the Tower-stairs, on his arrival, by the Lord Mayor in person, and by torch-light, it being seven o'clock in the evening, and conveyed to Sir Thomas Gresham's house, while the chief of the Nobility were in preparation to attend him to the Court. Great entertainments were made for him while he stayed, and persons of quality appointed to accompany him to Dover when he departed.§ But as his expedition took place, as Camden says, "In a sharp and snowy

* All taken from the letter of Mr. Gilbert Talbot to his father, to be seen in Lodge, ii. 203. Lord Leicester (as the Duke was a great sportsman), gave him hounds, horses, hawks, wood-knives, falchions, horns, cross-bows, and broad-cloth for hunting dresses.

† The mistake is the more extraordinary, because Camden rightly enough begins the year 1579, with the arrival of Casimir, "who," as he says, "had the last year brought an army of Germans into the Netherlands."

‡ He had formerly been a suitor to her Majesty.

§ The Duke was accompanied upon this occasion by the celebrated Herbert Languet, the tutor and great friend of Sir Philip Sidney; and who wrote an account of the visit, for the information of the Elector of Saxony, in which he speaks feelingly of the hospitality of the English, and the happiness of their country. "Their humanity towards me," saith he, "hath almost restored me winter,"* he had to encounter some difficulties both in going and coming. A few years after his visit to England, his brother the Palsgrave (Lewis VI.) died, leaving an infant for his heir, to whom Casimir became guardian; a change judged by some to be of great importance to the Protestant interests; the late Palsgrave being suspected of a leaning towards Popery.† The handsome reception of this German Prince was entirely intended as an encouragement to the Protestants in general, whose cause he very bravely supported, and was so well understood by the representatives of the Catholic powers, that the French and Spanish Ambassadors repined greatly at the favours heaped upon him. But to come to the negotiations on foot for the Queen's marriage.

In the summer Progress of 1578, her Majesty had been attended by more than one Minister from France, with a retinue, as Topcliff called them, of to health." "I have nothing more to write concerning them, than that they are by far the happiest nation in Christendom." And in one of his epistles he calls England, "Beatam Angliam, tanquam domicilium quietis et humanitatis."

* Though Camden is an author well known to all historians who have written of this particular period, yet Miss Aikin, in her Memoirs of the Court of Queen Elizabeth, expressly says, That it was in the autumn of 1578, that the Duke judged it necessary to come over to England. But it was certainly in winter, and his departure was attended with many hindrances and unpleasant circumstances, being first detained at Dover for want of a proper wind, and afterwards, according to a letter from Topcliff to Lord Shrewsbury, "He had a long time upon the seas, and could not land for weather; within these eighteen hours he rid at Blackness, near Bullogne. I write this that your Lordship may remember how much England may boast, to have in this little island such a Prince, envied by the Pope, the French, and Spain, and his departure known, and he to depart from hence in one of her Majesty's royal ships, in despite of them all, and in his way homeward, the weather, as it were, becalls them all to execute their malice."

† To shew how hazardous it is to trust to the most approved and apparently accurate histories, we must here notice another mistake of Strype's [Oxford Edition, 1824], in citing the letter of Mr. Talbot to his father, he writes, "That it was said, that his elder brother, the Palsgrave [Frederick III.], was dead." And then he adds, "The news of the Palsgrave's death proved true." Now it was not Frederick III., but Lewis VI., whose death at this time was expected. Frederick died in 1576, and so far from its having proved true, as reported, that the Palsgrave Lewis VI. died at this time, he did not die till 1583, when Casimir became guardian to his son, and Regent. Even Mr. Talbot is judged, by Mr. Lodge, to have mistaken the Palsgrave's character; see his note, vol. ii. 210. and Koch's Tableau des Revolutions de l'Europe, tom iv. table lxxxv. Another mistake frequently occurs in Strype, though not of much importance, he calls Lord Shrewsbury's second son, Lord Gilbert Talbot. Gilbert Talbot, after the death of his brother Francis, became Lord Talbot, but the letters in Lodge preceded that event; and at all events, as an Earl's son, Lord Gilbert Talbot could not be right.

"Monsieur's youths," as before observed. Monsieur de Basqueville was one, and Nicholas d'Angennes, Marquis of Rambouillet the other; but in October, came the most accomplished and engaging suitor of all, M. de Simier. He seems to have possessed all the vivacity, agreeableness, wit, dexterity, and shrewdness, peculiar to a Frenchman; with that talent for delicate flattery, which was likely, above all things, to work on a female mind, but especially on one which, through a very extraordinary kind of weakness, was not proof against flattery of the grossest kind. In February, 1579, Mr. Talbot, in a letter already referred to, thus speaks of this ingratiating minister: "Her Majesty continueth her very good usage of Monsieur Simier, and all his company, and he hath conference with her three or four times a week, and she is the best disposed and pleasantest, when she talketh with him (as by her gestures appeareth), that is possible. The opinion of Monsieur's coming," he goes on to say, "still holdeth, and yet it is secretly bruited that he cannot take up so much money as he would do on such a sudden, and therefore will not come so soon." On the 5th of March, he writes again, of Simier, and the marriage: "My Lord of Leicester is now at Wanstead, and this day Monsieur Simier and his company do dine with him. My Lord Treasurer was made a little afraid with the gout, but he intreated him so discourteously, as he is departed from him till a better opportunity; belike his Lordship is not at leisure to entertain him now, insomuch as he is now afoot again, and cometh abroad." And on the 4th of April, speaking of the Council generally, he says, "Their leisures are very little, for these five days last past, they have sitten in Privy Council, from eight of the clock in the morning till dinner-time; and presently after dinner, and an hour's conference with her Majesty, to Council again, and so till supper-time: and all this, as far as I can learn, is about the matter of Monsieur's coming hither, his entertainment here, and what demands are to be made unto him in the treaty of marriage."

It appears that the French Ambassadors came furnished with regular instructions, to propound, on the part of Monsieur, certain marriage articles, which bear date, June 16, 1579; and which, being accordingly laid before the Queen's Council, received such answers as the latter were prepared to give; the articles proposed, with the answers to each, may be seen in the Appendix to the 2d vol. of Strype's Annals, No. xviii. b. ii.

As the marriage never took place, it is unnecessary to dwell upon them; but while it was in agitation it kept the nation in great confusion. Some of the Council were unquestionably desirous that it should proceed, being anxious about the succession, and looking probably to the great change it might make, with regard to the Queen of Scots, if Elizabeth should have an heir, and be strengthened besides by a powerful foreign alliance to support his rights; while others of the Council, in the interest of Leicester, were probably very insincere in urging the Queen to marry, and the apprehensions awakened, of a return to Popery, by a marriage with a French Prince, disposed the Clergy generally, to denounce the match as full of danger to the Church and to the spread of the gospel. The pulpit resounded with such denunciations, and the press also was put in requisition to set the people, not only against the match generally, but against the person and character of the royal suitor. This was in a great measure the purport of the Puritan Stubbs's book,* for which he paid the forfeit of his right hand, while the Clergy were under restraint by a proclamation, vindicating the Duke's character, and that of his envoys, and shewing how much the Queen felt her honour touched, by the many false reports made of danger to the Church, the State, and her own person, by such intended marriage. Strype, who inclines to call this curious State Paper, a declaration on the part of the Queen to her subjects, rather than a proclamation, moved by the silence of Stow, Hollinshed, and Camden, has inserted it at length in his Annals of the Reformation, to which we must refer the reader, as well as to the same learned author's Life of Archbishop Grindal, Appendix, No. xiii., for the Council's letter to his Grace upon the same subject, signed by Lord Burghley, October 5, 1579.

But what seemed to turn her Majesty most aside from the match, was a private letter and address she received from Sir Philip Sidney, at this time, which

* See Strype's Life of Bishop Aylmer, p. 40. and his Life of Archbishop Grindal, 359, 360.—The title of the book may serve to shew the style of that party; viz. "The discovery of a gaping gulph, whereinto England is like to be swallowed by another French marriage, if the Lord forbid not the Banns, by letting her Majesty see the sin and punishment thereof." Stubbs himself, however, seems to have been much respected by persons of learning and character, one of his chief friends being Mr. Hicks, of Lincoln's-Inn, afterwards one of the Secretaries of Lord Burghley. Some years after the publication of this unfortunate book, Stubbs was employed by Lord Burghley himself, to answer Cardinal Allen's abusive book, called "The English Justice." Spenser, the Poet, was a friend of Stubbs; the celebrated Puritan, Cartwright, married his sister. He underwent the sentence of the law, November 3, 1579; his speech on the scaffold, before the cutting off his hand, may be seen in the Nugæ Antiquæ, iii. 179. as well as the speech of his fellow-sufferer Page, p. 182. and Stubbs' letters to the Queen, during his imprisonment, p. 202. and to the Privy-Council, 208.

letter is to be read in so many books,* that we may well stand excused from transcribing any part of it here; only observing, that whatever credit he may have acquired, for the solidity of his judgment, "wisdom in counsel, skill in politics, acquaintance with the Roman history, knowledge of foreign states and kingdoms," &c., it seems suspicious that such an address should have proceeded from the nephew of Leicester, at the very time that his insidious uncle was pretending, as earnestly as possible, to persuade the Queen to go forward with the marriage,† as her greatest security;‡—writing, however, occasionally to Lord Burghley, from Kenilworth and other places, of the extreme joy of the Papists, at the prospect of such a union; protesting to him "before God, that he wrote this to his Lordship simply and plainly, as manifest cause enforced;" and in another letter, offering to go into exile sooner than be suspected of being a hinderer of a match, which all the world seemed to desire.

To do her Majesty justice, she seems to have been very explicit with the French Ministers, in assuring them, that she would abide by the religion in which she was crowned, and allow of no innovations nor alterations in the reformed Church.§ But to the Ministers alone, the negotiation this year was

* See Strype's Annals, vol. ii. Appendix, No. xix. Cabala, 363, &c.—See also in Strype's Appendix, No. xx, a letter to the Queen from some person of quality, from a copy endorsed by Lord Burghley, "The Queen's marriage, February 10, 1562."

† We do not mean to affirm that Sir Philip himself, was actuated by any wrong motives; he had, as it has been well observed, "beheld with his own eyes the horrors of the Paris Massacre; he had imbibed, with all the eagerness of a youthful and generous mind, the principles of his friend Hubert Languet, one of the ablest advocates of the Protestant cause; and he had since, on his embassy to Germany and Holland, enjoyed the favour, and contemplated the illustrious virtues of William, Prince of Orange, its heroic champion;" (Aikin's Court of Elizabeth, ii. 74.) but the suspicion falls upon the Queen and Leicester. The former might be pleased to find Leicester's nephew adverse to the match, and Sidney might well suspect that his uncle was not sincere in urging it. In the Life of Leicester, however, (London, 1727), it is expressly affirmed, that Sir Philip was set to work by his uncle, p. 108. Many parts of the letter are certainly very good. Buchanan, who was still living, in a letter addressed to a particular friend of Sir Philip's, when the marriage of the Queen was in agitation a few years back [1574], affirmed it to be his opinion, that the French Prince would murder the Queen of England, and marry the Queen of Scotland. "Quorsum ad Britanniam eo? ad nuptias ais; et ego credo; ad quas? cum reginâ vestrâ? alii, ut volunt, accipiant. Ego prorsus ejus consilium esse reor, ut vestram trucidet, nostram ducat, formâ, ætate, et amicorum opibus florentem, et expertæ jam fœcunditatis."—Epist. Lond. 1711.

not entirely entrusted, the Royal Suitor himself having found the means and opportunity of passing over to England, and visiting her Majesty in person; in Lord Burghley's Diary, we find the following entry in the month of September: "Mons. the Duke of Alanson,* came to Greenwich secretly, and lodged at Mr. Light's House;" in truth, the Duke seems to have come as unexpectedly as secretly; having arrived at the very gate of the palace before he was known to be coming, and accompanied with very few attendants. He is supposed to have seized upon the opportunity of Leicester's being under a temporary disgrace, for his rude treatment of Simier, and for his marriage with Lady Essex, which Simier had ventured to discover to the Queen; and which, according to appearances, had nearly cost him his life, being fired at while with the Queen in her barge on the river.† It seems to be generally admitted, that of the private conversations between the Queen and the Duke, at Greenwich, on occasion of this unforeseen visit, nothing has transpired. The Duke soon returned to France, and in the next month, the Council had many meetings, to consider the perils and advantages of each alternative, that is, of her Majesty's marrying, or not marrying; a full statement of which, with the several opinions of the principal Counsellors, is to be seen in Murdin, taken from a copy in Lord Burghley's own hand-writing.‡ It is very certain that the Duke was well received by the Queen, and that in the way of personal liking, the visit did not turn out to his disadvantage, but the absolute decision seemed to be involved in greater perplexities than ever; the Queen appearing to wish to be guided by her Council, and the latter evidently inclining to leave the issue to her Majesty; so that after sundry debates and conferences, in which every member of the Council present seems to have delivered his opinion, no more certain conclusion was come to, than what is contained in the following words:

"Every Counsellor wisheth and liketh her Majesty to marry, and to have children to succeed her, and do think it more surety for her, than any other provision. And because her Majesty hath had an interview with the Duke of Anjou, whereby her Majesty doth best know, whether she hath liking to him or not, therefore all Counsellors do offer to her Majesty to favour the same with all their services and powers, if her Majesty shall like to marry him."

* This mistake is so common, that it may be well to explain the circumstances of the case; some writers having been led to suppose, that the Duke of Anjou who addressed her Majesty at this time, was the same that addressed her before; not observing that the title of Alençon was dropped, on Henry III. becoming King, and the title of Anjou assumed by his younger brother, with the title of Monsieur, as next heir to the Crown. In the entry immediately above, Lord Burghley rightly calls him, Monsieur le Duc d'Anjou.

† This story has been differently related, some thinking it quite accidental, others strongly insinuating that Simier was chiefly aimed at; at all events, there must have been great danger to the Queen, whose presence of mind seems to have been conspicuously displayed, and her mercy in pardoning the offender, after he had been brought to the gallows. ‡ Murdin, pp. 319—338.

Of the particular opinions of such members of the Privy Council* as were concerned in the debates referred to, the following is a pretty fair statement:

"The Earl of Sussex was still, as ever, strongly in favour of the match; and chiefly, as it appears, from an apprehension that France and Spain might otherwise join to dethrone the Queen and set up another in her place. Lord Hunsdon was on the same side, as was also the Lord Admiral (the Earl of Lincoln), but less warmly.† Lord Burghley laboured to find arguments in support of the measure, but evidently against his judgment, and to please the Queen.‡ Leicester openly professed to have changed his opinion, 'for her Majesty was to be followed.' Sir Walter Mildmay reasoned freely and forcibly against the measure, on the ground of the too advanced age of the Queen, and the religion, the previous public conduct, and the family connexions of Anjou. Sir Ralph Sadler subscribed to most of the objections of Mildmay, and brought forward additional ones.§ Sir Henry Sidney approved all these, and subjoined 'that the marriage could not be made good by all the counsel between England and Rome; a mass might not be suffered at Court,' meaning probably that the marriage rite could not by any expedient be accommodated to the consciences of both parties, and the law of England."—It is added in Lord Burghley's account, that Sir Henry "affirmed all Mr. Mildmay's speech."

The whole statement is certainly very curious, as a history of the perplexed state of Europe, and which seems very well to agree with all other histories, though in this instance applied to a particular purpose. One passage is, we think, of considerable importance, as tending to shew, that the cause of Mary Queen of Scots' detention, was the Pope's Bull against Elizabeth; and we

* The Privy Council, at this time, appears to have consisted of about eighteen members. [Annals, b. ii. ch. xix.]

† He did not like that the Queen should be made to apprehend perils either way; affirming the realm to be strong enough to withstand them.

‡ Lord Burghley's own argument is to be seen in Murdin, 335. From a paper in his own handwriting, the sum of it agrees with the conclusion above; namely, that except her Majesty would, of her own mind, incline to the marriage, he would never advise her thereto—probably on account of the disparity of ages.

§ The following could not be very agreeable to her Majesty: "In years, the Queen may be his mother." "Doubtfulness of issue more than before; few old maids escape."

really think it was so:—"And to satisfy that which may be objected, that it is no good example that her Majesty should aid other Princes' subjects, lest the like should be attempted against her; the difference is this, that first her Majesty professeth no enmity against any of those Kings, as to the deprivation of them from their crowns, as they do by their profession of their obedience to Rome, from whence her Majesty is, by Bulls, and such like, published to be unlawful Queen, and her realm given to those Kings, or to any other that will seek it for the Queen of Scots; so as these Kings have no cause to fear any evil from her Majesty, nor therefore to aid her subjects against her."

This is an admirable remark, and being actually the remark of Lord Burghley himself, may deserve to be insisted upon here. Elizabeth professed to assist persecuted Protestants, but not with the smallest design of wrenching the crowns from the heads of the Kings either of France or Spain; while they, as professed subjects of the Pope, could consistently have nothing less in view than the dethroning of Elizabeth, to the setting up of Mary Queen of Scots, if they could ever get the latter into their power.—The Pope's Bull absolutely left no alternative to any of the Catholic states, or Catholics in general. The delivery of Mary, and consequent dethronement of Elizabeth, was the great object held out to them, as the prize to be contended for; the reward of all their hopes and wishes.

Having given this account of the negotiations relating to the Queen's marriage, which appear to have greatly occupied the time, care, and attention of the Lord Treasurer, and indeed more so than was the case with any others of her Majesty's Council (for all the papers relating to it seem to have been drawn up by him),* we shall turn to the affairs of the Church and Universities,† where

* The following entry in his Diary seems to intimate, that articles were agreed upon in Nov. of this year:—"Nov. 22. Articuli concordati pro matrimonio Franc. Ducis Andium per D. de Burghley thesaur. D. Suss. D. Leicest. et D. Wilson pro Regina, et Jo. Symyers pro Duce Andium."

† In the University of Cambridge a difficulty arose in Christ's College, relating to a fellowship there, granted to the College by King Edward VI. The case was continually submitted to the judgment of Lord Burghley, as Chancellor, though finally settled (not, however, before the year 1581) by those who might have decided it at first, namely, the Vice Chancellor and two other Heads of Colleges, in whom it rested to determine the sense of any Statute in doubt; and this was a case of that nature. The dispute lay between the Master, Dr. Hawford, and a minority of the Fellows, and Hugh Broughton, King Edward's Fellow, and the other members of the foundation. It was finally adjudged in favour of Broughton; one of the greatest scholars in Christendom, for Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Talmudical learning.

In the University of Oxford, for the extirpation of all heresies, and better instruction of young much was passing that equally demanded his attention, during almost the whole of the year 1579.—The first case being one of dilapidations, in regard to which it is very extraordinary, that both the Metropolitans should have agreed to submit their particular differences (Grindal having been translated from York to Canterbury) to the sole arbitration of the Lord Treasurer Burghley.*

But the Archbishop of York (Sandys), "that good and peaceable Archbishop," as Strype, after due consideration, calls him, had other troubles upon his hands, particularly in a contest with the Dean of York, upheld by the Lord Huntingdon, President of the North. "This business," says Strype, "stuck exceedingly upon his mind, insomuch that he wanted a wise friend at Court to disclose his troubled thoughts to, and reckoned none so proper to break them to, as the Lord Treasurer, to whom therefore he wrote, saying, 'My heart greatly desireth to speak with your Lordship. I have matter of great importance, and that toucheth me near, to pray your Lordship's advice in. I must hang upon your help.'" The Lord Huntingdon also wrote to Lord Burghley, anxious to have all differences settled by his means, but the Archbishop, it seems, mistrusted the Earl's motion towards a reconcilement, and therefore wished to have the means of making the case properly known to the Queen; but, as he told Lord Burghley, "to open this matter to her Majesty, he dared to trust none, [no, not Leicester] except it were his Lordship, whose hearty and constant favour towards him he knew, rejoiced in, and gave God thanks for it."—His great desire was, that the Dean of York, with whom he had great contention, should be removed; but the Dean, as well as the Archbishop and Lord Huntingdon, threw himself upon the judgment and consideration of the Lord Treasurer, calling him his "special good Lord always; nay, receptus ab imbre, et latibulum a vento, for all injured persons to fly unto." The Lord Treasurer, however, could not well settle this difference by the Dean's removal as the Archbishop proposed, for he continued at York to the very year of the Archbishop's death, 1589.

On the 17th day of November this year [1579], when the Queen entered students, the following books were enjoined to be read to them, Nowel's larger Catechism in Latin and Greek; or, Calvin's Catechism in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; or, Hyperius's Elements of the Christian Religion; or, the Heidelberg Catechism;—the choice being left to the readers or tutors.—To these might be added, Henry Bullinger's Catechism, Calvin's Institutions, the Apology for the Church of England, or the Thirty-nine Articles, with an exposition, to be drawn from the Scriptures and testimony of the Fathers.—Collier, ii. 568–9.

* Strype's Annals, ii. part ii. 247.

into the 22d year of her reign, and therefore properly enough called, the "Queen's day," the Archbishop preached a sermon at York, setting forth the praise of the Queen, and the happiness of her subjects under her government; extracts from which may be seen in Strype, who concludes his remarks upon it, in these words: "The character of that excellent Queen, here given, may the rather be depended upon, both because of the preacher's protestation against flattery," (for the Archbishop had said, 'I speak not this in flattery, which thing be far from me, but in an upright conscience; not of guess, but of knowledge,') "and speaking from his own personal knowledge and experience; having long known the Queen, and being well acquainted with the Court and her proceedings."

But we cannot refrain from transcribing another passage, from a sermon of the Archbishop on a similar occasion, since the compliments (very just ones) paid to the Queen, are equally due to her great Minister, by whom all the great national benefits enumerated, were principally secured, as history sheweth.—"If any church, any people, any nation in the world, have cause to praise the Lord for their Prince, this land hath more than any, in respect of the wonderful blessings wherewith God, by the ministry of his handmaid [Queen Elizabeth], hath enriched us, far beyond all that we are possibly able to conceive.—Look upon other Princes at this day. Some are drawn with the poisoned cup of that harlot [Rome], whose venom her highness doth abhor. Some have embrued themselves in blood: wherewith her Majesty did never yet stain the tip of her finger. When they tremble in wars, she sitteth in peace. When they break oaths and covenants, she keepeth promise. Therefore God hath blessed the work of her hands. She found this realm in war; she hath established it in peace. She found it in debt, which she hath discharged. She hath changed dross into silver and gold. She hath, by living within compass, and sparing wasteful expences, without pressing the people, or seeking more than ordinary and useful tribute, furnished this land with so great a navy, with store of armour and warlike munition, both for defence and offence, as England never had in former times. This I speak, not of flattery (it was never my fault), but rather in sincerity, testifying the truth; that seeing your happiness, you may be thankful."

In the course of this year, Bishop Cox also, as well as the worthy Archbishop Sandys, had great cause to apply to his old friend Lord Burghley, quasi anchoræ firmissimæ, to use the Bishop's own words. The causes are to be seen in Strype, where also is a full account given of the Bishop's earnest entreaty to the Queen, through the Lord Treasurer, to be permitted to resign his troublesome bishopric, in which Lord Burghley seems to have stood his friend, though not to the full accomplishment of all he desired, for he continued Bishop to the day of his death, anno 1581.—The Bishops of Norwich, Peterborough, London,* Rochester, Lincoln, and Chichester, had all of them, as it appears, special occasion to address his Lordship this year, upon certain points touching their sees, which they did constantly with the greatest possible deference, to his judgment and decision upon the cases referred to him, as their "only refuge, whom this age and time did acknowledge to be the chief patron and stay, next under her Majesty, unto the Church of England."—As one, "who, if he did but once

* Aylmer Bishop of London wrote to him about a book that had been found in the possession of a printer, entitled the innocence of the Scottish Queen, in French, and in which the execution of the Duke of Norfolk was inveighed against, the Northern rebellion defended, and much said against the Lord Keeper and Lord Burghley; this happened in December, but earlier in the year, this Bishop had written very sharply to the Lord Treasurer, expostulating with him for not having sufficiently supported him, in the exercise of his episcopal authority, and wishing to be discharged of his trust, but as his temper was hot, he afterwards repented of what he had written, and begged to have it forgotten and forgiven; lamenting that he had been so moved by the grief he felt, that the Lord Treasurer should have a discontented mind towards him, whose friendship he valued above all. Lord Burghley however had answered him; and as Strype justly enough considers his letter to be a fair specimen of the "most admirable, wise, and serene temper his Lordship was master of," it is fit that we should transcribe it.

"My good Lord,—Your Lordship's letter is too full of choler for me to answer directly without adding of choler; and so I should, addere oleum igni, add oil to the fire, but I am otherwise disposed, both for reverence to your spiritual vocation, and for charity to mine own familiar acquaintance. For the opinion by you conceived of me, as not bearing you good will, surely your Lordship therein doth misinform yourself: and for answer, coram Domino, I protest that I bear you no kind of disfavour. That I have said to you of your wasting of timber, I spake as a public officer, and will speak the like upon like occasion to any of your estate, how dearly soever I shall love them.

"For reprehension of the common misusage by Bishops, Chancellors, Commissaries, Summoners, and such like, I say, with grief of mind, that I see therein no true use of the discipline meant at the first erection of those officers (which I allow well of), but a corrupting of them to private gain, and not to the public benefit, and edifying of the Church. And it grieveth me to see the fond, light, pretended reformers, to have occasion ministered unwisely to condemn the officers, where they should condemn the misuse thereof.

"And so, my Lord, lest in much writing I should by heat of argument stir your choler, I end, and pardon your taunts sparkled in your letter.

"Your Lordship's, with reverence and Christian charity, know the truth fully, would see redress had without their requests, even for the pity of the poor that God had planted in his heart;"—as "the common patron of the Bishops and all others in distress."—With many passages to the same purport, too numerous, and too frequent, to be particularly noticed.

Great trouble was given to many Bishops this year by the sect which called itself the Family of Love,* as may be seen in the Annals of the Reformation so often referred to, and which indeed was the occasion of Lord Burghley being so frequently written to, particularly by the Bishop of Norwich, in whose diocese they seem to have abounded. For the principles, erroneous doctrines, and enthusiastic proceedings of this sect we must refer to Strype. Colchester seems to have been the place of their first association. This sect of Familists,† as they were called, appears to have been kept on foot till towards the middle of the ensuing century.

In the obituary of this year, besides Sir Nicholas Bacon, who, dying on the 20th of February 1578-9, has been already mentioned, we find Sir Thomas Gresham, and the celebrated George Ferrers, Master of the King's Pastimes, in the time of Edward VI.—Of Sir Thomas Gresham, the founder of the Royal Exchange in London, and the useful negotiator of foreign loans, so many accounts are extant, that we need not say more about him, than that he died in great favour with the Queen, very rich, the fruits of which are to be found to this day, in many of our city charities and public endowments. Of George Ferrers a short account may be seen in Miss Aikin's entertaining account of the Court of Queen Elizabeth; he was a contributor to that very curious work, "the Mirror for Magistrates;" of which a very interesting account is to be found in the eighth chapter of the same work.

The Queen's Progress in the summer of the year 1579, seems to have been confined to the counties of Essex and Suffolk, but as nothing occurs in the accounts remaining of it, that can be said particularly to relate to Lord Burghley, we shall think it quite sufficient to refer the reader to Mr. Nichols' celebrated work.

In Scotland and Ireland many things occurred this year, which were of great importance in themselves, but of which we shall have a better opportunity of speaking under the year ensuing.

CHAP. VIII.

Twenty-second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign commenced November 17, 1579.

We have again to complain of the inaccuracy of Strype in regard to dates; he begins the history of the year 1580, with the departure of Monsieur from England, as though he had continued with the Queen many months after his very sudden and unexpected arrival at Greenwich, in the autumn of 1579, whereas he very quickly returned to France at that time, and never came again till the year 1581; in fact, what he has written in his Annals of the Reformation at the beginning of the year 1580, of Monsieur's departure for Flushing, with a great attendance of English Nobility, belongs entirely to the year following, as may be seen by the very letter to which he refers, since published by Mr. Lodge.* We may impute such mistakes probably to the circumstance of Strype's having consulted the original manuscripts, where the dates are not always fully expressed, the day of the month often appearing without that of the year, as seems to have been the case with the letter in question; such mistakes, however, in works of known repute, are exceedingly embarrassing to other explorers of history, and ought to be noticed when they occur. We have been the more anxious to follow Strype, because no other author has written so much of Lord Burghley; though chiefly indeed upon points relating to the Church or Universities, the chief subjects of his many useful works.

We shall pass by also what is said by the same diligent writer of the proceedings in Parliament and Convocation, under the year 1580, it being much more easy now to follow the historical than the civil reckoning; and to carry on these matters, therefore, to the year 1581, since, in truth, though Strype begins his twenty-first chapter, b. ii. in the following manner: "A reformation of several abuses in the Church was moved again in a session of Parliament this year," viz. 1580, which commonly passes for the twenty-second year of the Queen's reign, the Parliament did not meet till the 16th of Jan. 1581, being the third month of the twenty-third year of her reign.*

It would seem from a paper in Murdin, p. 338, that though, on the Duc d'Anjou's departure in 1579, the Queen seemed very favourably impressed with his visit, and disposed towards the marriage, yet, that as early as the month of Jan. 1579-80, either of "her own disposition, or by persuasion of others whom she trusted," as the paper expresseth it, she did "not hold in the same mind." It was judged necessary, therefore, to be prepared against the perils that might ensue upon breaking off the match, and the paper referred to, after Lord Burghley's usual manner, discusses all these points: first, stating the principal dangers to be apprehended, and secondly, the likeliest means to avert those dangers, in which every particular of defence, by ships, soldiers, fortifications, and alliances, is distinctly dwelt upon; and due attention paid to the securing of numerous vents and markets for the sale or barter of English goods, by means of the Low Countries, Emden, Hamburgh, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Muscovy, Portugal, Italy, Barbary, and Turkey, so that if the traffic with some should happen to be stopped, it might remain open with others, that "the lack of the rest might be the better borne." I question, however, whether this paper was not rather drawn up by Lord Sussex than by Lord Burghley from its conclusion.—Decidedly like most others of the same age and description, it is well calculated to give the reader a view of the perplexed state of European politics at the time, and of the difficulty of deciding between many different expedients as the paper itself sets forth: "Which of these may be best done alone by itself, or how every of them in some parts may be linked with its fellows, asketh a long time of thinking of, and a great time of deep consideration; because the ill that may grow by every of them, lyeth open before the eyes of all men; and the good of all men, and the good of any of them, must be searched for very deep. Thus doth your Majesty see the objection of perils and shows of remedies; which I do pray to God not to fall out to be but shows indeed. Whereas your marriage, if you had liked it, might have provided you more surety with less peril; and for myself I humbly beseech your Majesty, that I may be the first man that may be employed to spend my blood for your service, in the place where you think to be your first peril, without exception of persons, time, place, or matter."

* It is surprising how much confusion of dates might have been obviated, by the adoption of a very curious canon in Ptolemy's Tables, by which every King's reign was made to concur with the current year, by carrying back the day of his accession, happen when it might, to the preceding thoth or new-year's-day, all the odd months of his last year being carried forward, and included in the first year of his successor.—See Hales's Analogy of Chronology, vol. i. 171, and Clinton's Fasti Hellenici. In this manner the whole of the year 1558 might have been called the first of Elizabeth, though she actually came to the throne not quite two months before the conclusion of that year. Camden, indeed, and others have made it so, but confusedly enough.

In the summer of this year, the Prince of Condé came into England, to solicit the Queen's assistance in behalf of the King of Navarre, his brother, and the French Protestants; a circumstance which seems to have excited some jealousy in the Court, to judge from the letters that passed between the Lords Burghley and Sussex.

The first from Lord Burghley begins as follows, written from Norwich: "My very good Lord, with thanks for your letter and messenger, who, on Friday, met one coming from Theobalds, I came yesterday hither about five of the clock; and repairing towards the privy chamber, to have seen her Majesty, I found the door, at the upper end of the privy chamber, shut; and then understood that the French Ambassador had been a long time with her Majesty, and the Prince of Condé also. Where there were none other of the council but my Lord of Leicester and Mr. Vice-Chamberlain Hatton, Mr. Secretary Walsingham being sick in his chamber; and so, about seven of the clock, the French Ambassador, being ready to depart towards London, came to me, and told me a great part of their proceedings, being pleased well with her Majesty for her temperate dealings, but no way contented with the Prince of Condé, in whom he findeth more disposition to move troubles in France, than to enjoy peace; and he addeth, that he verily thinketh that these troubles in France, and the Princes coming hither, are provoked from hence. Wherein I know nothing of certainty, but should be sorry it should be so in truth. Nevertheless, he augmenteth his suspicions upon the sight he hath of the great favours shewed to the Prince of Condé by certain Counsellors here, whom he understandeth have been many times, both on Friday and Saturday with him at the banqueting-house where he is lodged.

" By her Majesty I perceive the just cause of his coming is for money in this sort: that is, after this rate; the charge to be borne: viz. a part by the King of Navarre and his part: another by Casimere and certain Princes Protestants: and a third, is required from her Majesty. What they may prove I know not. I wish her Majesty may spend some portion to solicit for them some peace, to the good of the cause of religion, but to enter into a war, and therewith to break the marriage; and so to be left alone, as subject to the burthen of such a war, I think no good Counsellor can allow. It is likely that the Prince shall depart to-morrow by sea to Flushing.

" Your Lordship's most assured,*

" June 1580." " W. BURGHLEY."

On the first of July,† Lord Sussex wrote to Lord Burghley as follows:

" My good Lord, sending this bearer to see how her Majesty doth, I would not omit to write these few lines to you. I have never heard word from my Lord of Leicester, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, or Mr. Secretary Walsingham, of the

* Strype's Annals, vol. ii. Appendix, No. xxv.; but the letter is introduced again in vol. iii. part i. p. 15. under the year 1581, which must be wrong.

† Mr. Lodge has published a letter from Lord Sussex to Lord Burghley, of a date only three days previous to this, which reflects such honour on the latter, that it ought not to be omitted:

" My good Lord,—I have seen a letter which it pleased your Lordship most honourably and kindly to write to my wife, greatly to her comfort when she was grieved, for the which I do think myself more bound to your Lordship than I can write; and so I beseech you to conceive, and therewith to make certain account that both she and I do love, honour, and reverence you as a father, and will do you all the service we can, as far as any child you have, with heart and hand, and so pray you to dispose of us both.

" The true fear of God, which your actions have always shewed to be in your heart; the great and deep care which you have always had for the honour and safety of the Queen's most worthy person; the continual trouble which you have of long time taken for the benefitting of the commonwealth; and the upright course which you have always taken, respecting the matter and not the person, in all causes (which be the necessary fruits of him that feareth God truly, serveth his Sovereign faithfully, and loveth his country dearly), have tied me to your Lordship in that knot which no worldly frailty can break; and, therefore, I will never forbear to own any fortune that coming of the Prince of Condé, or his expectation, or to seek to know my opinion what I thought fit to do in his causes: whereby I see either they seek to keep the whole from me, or else care little for my opinion, or will wrest the Prince, and the rest of that sort, to think I am no friend to their cause: which of these so ever it be, I do not weigh, any more than they weigh the making of me a stranger to the matter; and therefore if your Lordship have not already acquainted any of them with your writing to me in that matter, I pray your Lordship let them not know of it, and perhaps at my coming, some of them will mislike I am made such a stranger, though not in respect of myself, yet in respect of her Majesty's service; wherein I do not doubt but both her Majesty and the world do conceive I can give as sound an opinion as the best of them, and so have done in all cases hitherto.

"Thus I am bold to scribble my mind to your Lordship, being very lothe to see my Sovereign Lady to be violently drawn into war, which I know is naturally against her heart, and all the world doth see is more than she shall be able to maintain, and therefore must of necessity be perilous to her.

"Your's, most assured,

"T. Sussex."

From these letters we may perceive that something was going forward, contrary to the wishes of these two great and honest Counsellors. It appears, however, that the Prince was sent back without any stipulated aid; but that the may serve you, and further your honourable dealings in these your godly actions. And so, my good Lord, forbearing to trouble you with words, I end; and wish unto you as unto myself, and better, if I may. "At Newhall, June 28, 1580.

Lodge, ii. No. cxlvi. p. 229. "T. Sussex."

We cannot forbear noticing one passage in the above letter, namely, the credit given by this worthy and honourable Nobleman to Lord B. for "respecting the matter and not the person in all causes." The same credit is given to him by abundance of other persons who knew him well: an honour so much the greater, because we find it absolutely noticed in a Homily set forth on occasion of the earthquake this year, that in some courts there was so much corruption, that it had become a common by-word, that "as a man is friended, so the law is ended;" and though it is recorded among the chief glories of Elizabeth's reign, that justice was never so well administered, or the Courts of Law under better regulation; yet, it cannot be doubted, that there were great abuses. See, among other instances, the complaint of the suffragan Bishop of Dover, of the release of a murderer by bribing the Lord Chief Baron.—Strype's Annals, iii. 391, 392; and the letter of Fletewoode, Recorder of London, to Lord Burghley, relating to the "Gyntylmen" of London, who expected to be exempt from all indictments or punishment in consideration of their quality.—Ellis's Original Letters, vol. ii. 291, 292. First Series.

Queen promised to write to the King of France, and do all that a Christian Prince could do, to "accord things amiss;" but the King of Navarre stood upon his defence.

It became necessary this year to look narrowly after the Papists; England appearing to be subject to a systematic attack from Popish missionaries, whose designs became so apparent to the friends of Protestantism abroad, as well as at home, as to induce them to send over many very serious warnings of the mischief they suspected.

"The good friends of England and the English Church," says Strype, "I mean the divines of Switzerland (with whom, and our Bishops, was maintained a constant good correspondence, ever since they were harboured kindly and friendly with them, in Queen Mary's bloody reign), gave intelligence of the Popish diligence at this time." One letter from thence was sent to the Bishop of Ely, who dispatched notice of it to the good Lord Treasurer, beginning with these words: "Antichristi incendium accenditur Romæ, et in omnem fere orbem divulgatur: as we have lately heard from our true friends, and who heartily favour both our kingdom, our Queen and our Nobility, that the Pope's bull by the means of Alexandrini Cardinali, was to be published against the Queen, and 500 copies of it to be printed, in order to be dispersed in those parts of the world that were judged most Catholic." The original in Latin, as given by Strype, Annals, ii. Appendix, xxxvii. and Life of Whitgift, Appendix, b. ii. No. iii., expresses these things better, but it is not necessary to enlarge upon what was mere matter of rumour,* since facts may be adduced to prove the efforts at this time making by Gregory XIII. to disturb in every way that he could, the peace of England, by a regularly organized army of Jesuits prepared for every practicable deception. It is impossible to be totally deceived about these things, though being mixed up, as the case was, with religious prejudices and partialities, it is difficult even now, so to write, as to gain universal credit. To any unprejudiced mind, indeed, if such can be found, the mere history of the establishments abroad, at this period, justly denominated seminaries,† might, one would hope, convey sufficient information to lead to the knowledge of the exact truth.

* Gualter, of Zurich, wrote to the same effect to both the Archbishops, Grindal and Sandys; advising them of a fresh publication and dispersion of Pope Pius's bull, and of the preparations of the Pope and Spaniard to invade England.

† As the Popish Priests died off in England, new ones were to be sent over from these Colleges, "To sow," as Camden says, "the seeds of the Romish religion in England." But they

Of the beginning of these seminaries, Strype gives the following account, under the present year 1580.

"The fautors for the Pope, and for restoring of his religion and authority in this kingdom, were active now also;* and to further these their designs, the English Popish Clergy who had fled into Flanders, by the instigation of William Allen, a Jesuit,† a man of notable parts, and great esteem among the fugitives, [had] assembled themselves together at a town there, called Doway; and there set up a school. [A. D. 1568.] The Pope gave them an annual pension or rather a maintenance; purposely to plot and contrive ways to expel the Queen, and demolish the Church of England.‡ After they had tarried there some years, upon some troubles they removed most of them to Scotland; where the Queen of Scots allowed them a pension, and liberty to set up another school for the education of English youth who would come thither. Here they were taught all manner of ways to divide the Protestants of England, in principles of religion, as also to withdraw them from the form of prayer established. And there was an oath the scholars of this College took; viz. I, A. B., do acknowledge the ecclesiastical and political power of his Holiness and the Mother Church of sowed other seeds also, if there be any truth in history. It is the remark of Lord Burghley himself, that "although their outward pretence be, to be sent from the seminaries to convert people to their religion, yet without reconciling of them from their obedience to the Queen, they never give them absolution."—See Birch and Macdiarmid.

* See in the Annals, ii. pp. 355, 356, the names of some of the principal fautors of the Pope, as discovered by A. Monday; to whom a priest at Rome is reported to have spoken thus of Queen Elizabeth and her Council: "That proud, usurping Jezebel, whom God reserveth to make her a public spectacle to the whole world, for keeping that good Queen of Scots from her lawful rule. But I hope ere long the dogs shall tear her flesh, and those that be her props and upholders. Such speeches were not very likely to mollify the heart of Elizabeth, or do Mary any good, but that she was often so spoken of by the Papists we have no doubt, and that the threatened vengeance was always preparing, could they have once got Mary into their power, is as little questionable.

‡ "To be at that time a Catholic, and to think Elizabeth an usurper, and Mary the rightful Queen; and to desire to have a Catholic Sovereign on the throne of England, were inseparable circumstances. There was not perhaps one member of the Romish Church in Europe, who had other sentiments."—Turner. With the author just cited, and in regard to every thing in these volumes relating to the unfortunate struggle between Mary and Elizabeth, I must say, in Mr. Turner's own words, "I wish not to press any one to a harsh opinion on this subject, but feel that I ought not to conceal the unbiassed tendency of my own."

Rome, as the chief head and matron, above all pretended Churches throughout the whole earth. And that my zeal shall be for St. Peter and his successors, as the founder of the true and Catholic faith, against all heretical Kings, Princes, States, or powers, repugnant unto the same. And although I, A. B., may pretend, in case of persecution, or otherwise, to be heretically disposed, yet in soul and conscience I shall help, aid, and succour the Mother Church, &c."

As we generally follow Strype, we have copied this account, though we are not prepared to say that the whole of it is quite correct, but it is very certain that one of the first seminaries, established on the Continent, by English fugitives, was at Douay,* where Allen endeavoured, all he could, to collect together a school of English Students, who should be instructed to oppose heresies, to justify the Romish religion, and to answer all such books as should be written in defence of the Church of England.

In this College, according to Rapin, while the Duke of Alva was Governor of the Netherlands, all the plots, in favour of the Queen of Scots, were hatched and formed. And as to the oath, said to have been administered to the Students, it is entirely certain that many who were sent into England from these foreign seminaries, to sow division among the Protestants, had special licenses from the Pope, to assume any character they chose, and act as the oath states, as though they "were" themselves "heretically disposed;" not merely to avoid persecution, which might have been comparatively justifiable, but to create confusion among the Reformed, and thereby facilitate, on the part of the state, a return to the authority of the Church of Rome.

From Douay, towards the year 1569, the seminary was removed to Rheims; Allen being made a Canon there, through the influence of the Guises, and the College of Douay broken up, by an order of the Governor, Don Lewis, Commendator of Requesens, for all English fugitives to depart from his Government, in return for the exclusion of the insurgent navy of the Low Countries, from the English ports. The object of the Students of the Douay College, says Dr. Lingard, was "to study Theology, to receive orders, and to return to England, that a constant succession might be maintained. In the course of the first five years, Dr. Allen sent almost one hundred missionaries into England." The great question between the opposite parties to this day, relates to the employment of these missionaries in England. What is imputed to them, of evil practices, tending to disturb the peace of the kingdom, weaken the Queen's authority, and endanger her crown, and her life, and re-introduce the Romish religion, is, with the exception of the last, by all Romanists discredited, as the mere invectives of the Crown Lawyers, during the trials of the missionaries; but there are surely sufficient proofs enough still extant of their dangerous purposes; at all events, Popish missionaries could scarcely fail to fall under suspicion, while the bull of Pius V. was known to be in operation, and indulgences from Rome a cover for all insidious practices. We are called upon still, to trust to Allen's "Apologies and True Declarations of the Institution and Endeavours of the two English Colleges," but we must have leave to trust much more to the facts upon record, to the contrary. Nothing, we think, can be more certain, than that under colour, as Rapin says, of administering the Sacraments to the Catholics, many came into England at this time, for no other purpose, but to preach sedition and rebellion. "So long," says he, "as the Court imagined these men only administered the Sacrament in private to those of their religion, no notice seemed to be taken of it, but it was discovered at length that they were diligent in spreading pernicious principles, which might be attended with ill consequences. They maintained that the Pope had by divine right, full power to dethrone Kings; and Elizabeth being excommunicated, and deposed by Pius the Fifth's bull, her subjects were freed from their allegiance. Four of these dangerous emissaries were condemned and executed, for daring to maintain publicly, that the Queen was lawfully deposed. This did not hinder the two seminaries from continually sending incendiaries into England, with whom were joined Robert Parsons and Edmund Campian, Jesuits,* who were the first of that order employed to preach the fore-mentioned dangerous tenets. They obtained of the Pope, a bull, dated the 14th of August, 1580, declaring that Pope Pius's bull did for ever bind Elizabeth and the heretics, but not the Catholics, till a favourable opportunity should offer to put it in execution.† These two Jesuits had professed the Protestant religion, and even borne offices in the University of Oxford. After that, withdrawing out of the kingdom, they returned from time to time, appearing one while like clergymen, another while like soldiers, or in some disguise,* and frequented the houses of the Catholics, under pretence of instructing and comforting them, but in reality to inspire them with sedition and rebellion." This is the account Rapin gives of the proceedings of the Papists, under the year 1580, and which led to what may be called the Queen's first proclamation, to call home the children of those who had gone abroad for education,† and to forbid the harbouring any Jesuits or Priests, sent forth from the seminaries of Rome or Rheims, on pain of being punished as favourers of rebels and seditious persons.

Rapin proceeds,—"Shortly after, printed books were dispersed, intimating, that the Pope and King of Spain had conspired to conquer England, and restore the Catholic religion, and exhorting the English Papists to encourage the design. Whereupon the Queen issued another proclamation, declaring she was not ignorant of the practices of her enemies, but by the blessing of God, and the help of her faithful subjects she was able to withstand their attacks both at home and abroad :‡ that moreover, as the plots which were contriving were not only against her person, but also against the whole kingdom, she did not intend to be cruel to the good, by sparing the bad ; and therefore such as would not for the future keep within the bounds of duty were to expect no favour." He goes

* See Camden.

† "To these seminaries," says Camden, "were sent daily out of England by the Papists, in contempt and despite of the laws, great numbers of boys, and young men of all sorts, and admitted into the same, making a vow to return into England. Others also crept secretly from thence into the land, and more were daily expected with the Jesuits, who at this time first came into England. Hereupon, there came forth a proclamation, &c." Of the use made of the children sent over, the same author gives the following account : "Out of these seminaries were sent forth into divers parts of England and Ireland, at first a few young men, and afterwards more, according as they grew up, who were entered over hastily into holy orders [Strype calls them boy-priests disguised], and instructed into the above-mentioned principles. They pretended only to administer the Sacraments of the Romish religion, and to preach to Papists ; but the Queen and her Council soon found that they were sent underhand to seduce the subjects from their allegiance and obedience due to their Prince, to oblige them, by reconciliation, to obey the Pope's commands, to stir up intestine rebellions, under the seal of confession, and flatly to execute the sentence of Pius Quintus against the Queen, to the end that way might be made for the Pope and the Spaniard, who had of late designed the conquest of England."

‡ "And to that purpose had mustered her forces both by sea and land, and had them now in readiness against any hostile invasion."—Camden. Of the attention paid to these things by those who thought the country in danger, and were anxious to provide for its security, see the account of a Tract presented to the Queen, by a military gentleman, of the name of Hitchcock.—Annals, ii. p. 368.

on, by a reference to the proceedings in Ireland, to shew, that "the menaces of the Pope and King of Spain were not entirely vain."

We might have transcribed nearly the same account from Camden, but as Rapin wrote a century after, and has often been at the pains to correct Camden where he judged him to be wrong, we may conclude that Camden's account, who lived and wrote so near the very time, had sufficiently stood the test of criticism and inquiry, to induce Rapin to adopt his relation of matters; for in many points, as we have shewn by our notes, the two authors perfectly agree: Rapin besides, has the support of his diligent contemporary Strype, and though a modern Catholic writer, Dr. Lingard, writes, that "Camden has given an account of the seminaries, which appears to be taken from the declamatory invectives of the crown lawyers, during the trials of the missionaries, but that they universally denied these charges; which were victoriously answered by Dr. Allen in a tract intituled, 'Apology and True Declaration of the Institution and Endeavours of the two English Colleges,' &c. yet the reader should still be told that Dr. Allen's victorious answer, did not pass without a reply from the pen of Dr. Bilson, Warden of Winchester, who wrote in 1585, and whose book was designed to shew the "true difference between christian subjection and unchristian rebellion," which book, as Strype says, "seasonably met with Dr. Allen's Apology and True Declaration," &c.:—as well as with another book of the same stamp and character, called, "a Defence of the English Catholics that suffer for their faith."—It is impossible to refer to all these writers in a work like the present, though the case is one, which particularly affects the reputation of Lord Burghley, and his friend Sir Francis Walsingham, both of whom may be reckoned among the writers,* who took upon them to refute

* See Lord Burghley's Treatise on the Execution of Justice, written in 1583, and Sir Francis Walsingham's admirable letter to Monsieur Cretoy, Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. ii. In citing these two works, we do in no manner seek to excuse the cruelties actually inflicted on Popish and other recusants, much less the use of torture, which, till the Queen put a stop to it, was certainly judged to be, under certain circumstances, a good political engine; we merely intend to shew, that the object contemplated was decidedly the restraint of treasonable conspiracies; and interference with the Laws.—It is certainly melancholy to think that any person of any age, could write or speak of torture with a degree of indifference, as though it could under any circumstances, be rendered a just mode of proceeding, but as Lord B. had certainly the character of being a humane man in all private, and most of his public concerns, we can only plead the spirit of the age and rejoice that we are more civilized. Mr. Hallam has some excellent observations upon this in his Constitutional History of England, where he does what he can to save the credit of the calumnies of Allen; whereby the Queen's government was charged with no less crimes than heresy, tyranny, and blasphemy.

We shall now subjoin Dr. Lingard's own account of the coming of Parsons [Persons] and Campian into England this year. After speaking of the execution of certain Papists, whom he represents to have suffered, not on any satisfactory evidence, but merely on presumptions, he proceeds as follows:

"The experience of ages has proved, that such severities cannot damp the ardour of religious zeal. Missionaries now poured into the kingdom. Gregory XIII. established an additional seminary in Rome, and Mercurianus, the general of the Jesuits, assented to the request of Allen, that the members of his order might share in the dangers and glory of the mission. For this purpose he selected Robert Persons and Edward Campian, two Englishmen of distinguished merits and ability. Their arrival awakened the suspicion of the Queen and the Council: it was believed, or at least pretended, that they had come with the same traiterous object as Sanders, who in the preceding year had animated the insurgents of Ireland to oppose the authority of the Sovereign: and the pursuivants were stimulated with promises and threats, to seek out and apprehend the two Missionaries;" he then mentions the proclamation before spoken of, and the proceedings in Parliament, where "the Ministers called on the two Houses for laws of greater severity, to defeat the devices of the Pope." But as these things belong, according to our arrangement, rather to the year following, we shall, at present, offer no farther observations, than such as relate to the suspicions raised in the breasts of the Ministers, of the devices of the Pope, and we cannot, upon this head, refrain from remarking, that if they had not suspected that the designs of Gregory lay deeper than what was ostensibly declared by his emissaries, they would have deserved to have been removed for ever from the Queen's confidence. It may be quite true that the ardour of religious zeal is not to be damped by excessive severities; but why then, it may be asked, were two such able and noted Jesuits sent from Rome, even on the Pope's own Lord Burghley, upon the points alluded to, and in the fairest way imaginable; namely, by citing one of his own memorials addressed to the Queen, nearly at the same time, in which he displays sentiments and feelings, both just and tolerant, and as Leicester and Walsingham were chiefly blamed by the Catholics, and the Queen ordered torture to be disused, and interposed to soften some of the rigours of punishment, as Mr. Hallam allows, we would hope, that Lord B. had no small share in suggesting such amendments.—It is reasonable to think so on various accounts.

shewing, if it were not to prevent the ardour of the English Catholics being damped by the severities described, and why was that religious ardour to be kept up, but to force back upon England a discarded faith, a renounced authority, and a government less obnoxious to the Pope; the dangers they courted, were the proclaimed penalties of treason and sedition; they must have known that, in the face of such proclamations, they could not be harboured or entertained in England, without hazard rather than help to their friends and adherents there, or without practising some disguise to elude suspicion.*

Presumptive proofs indeed are no favourites with us, especially where the life of man is concerned, but where the presumption rests on the avowed designs and undoubted purposes of a party,† the mere denial of such designs and purposes,

* I must again refer to Mr. Turner's book for a corroboration of the view I have taken of these things, had I been furnished with it in time, in compliance with my own desires, I might have been spared much trouble of investigation.

† As Dr. Lingard has himself mentioned Sanders, it may not be amiss to see what were his avowed designs and undoubted purposes, as a Popish emissary, transcribed from his own original letter to the Catholics in Ireland, written in this very year, 1580, and urging them to rebellion.

"To the right honourable and Catholic Lords, and worthy gentlemen of Ireland, N. Sanders D.D. wisheth all felicity.

"Pardon me, I beseech you, if upon just cause I use the same words to your honours and worships, which St. Paul wrote sometime to the Galatians; who hath enchanted you not to obey the truth? for if ye be not bewitched, what mean you to fight for heresy against the truth, for the Devil against God, for tyrants that rob you of your goods, lands, lives, and everlasting salvation, against your own brethren, who daily spend their goods and shed their blood, to deliver you from these miseries? what mean you, I say, to be at so great charges, to take so great pain, and to put yourselves in so horrible danger of body and soul, for a wicked woman, neither begotten in true wedlock, nor esteeming her christendom, and therefore deprived by the Vicar of Christ, her and your lawful judge; forsaken of God, who justifieth the sentence of his Vicar; forsaken of all Catholic Princes, whom she hath injured intolerably; forsaken of divers lords, knights and gentlemen, of England, who ten years past took the sword against her, and yet stand in the same quarrel? See ye not, that she is without a lawful heir of her own body, who may either reward her friends or revenge her enemies? See you not, that she is such a reproach to the crown, that whoso is indeed a friend to the crown, should so much the more hasten to dispossess her of the same? See you not, that the next Catholic heir to the crown (for the Pope will take order by God's grace that it shall rest in none other but Catholics), must account all them for traitors that spend their goods in maintaining an heretic against his true title and right? what will ye answer to the Pope's Lieutenant, when he, bringing us the Pope's and other Catholic Princes' aid (as shortly he will), shall charge you with the crime and pain of heretics, for maintaining an heretical pretensed Queen, against the public sentence of Christ's Vicar? can she with her feigned supremacy (which he Devil instituted in Paradise when he made Eve Adam's mistress in God's matters), absolve and on the part of individuals, provided with secret instructions, indulgences as well as pardons from an infallible judge, for all sorts of prevarications and deceptions in the pursuit and accomplishment of such designs and purposes, mere denials I repeat, could scarcely have been received as any proof of innocence, in the then state of Europe and of England. But we shall have more to say upon this under the ensuing year. For the present, we must grant, that the English precautions appear to have fully equalled the Pope's diligence, and to have succeeded in checking the mischief intended against the Queen and her government, in the councils of Madrid and Rome, to say nothing at present of France, the Guises, and the League.*

Much as these things must have occupied the attention of Lord Burghley, he was by no means free from care and trouble, appertaining to his high office of Chancellor of Cambridge, the particulars of which are related by Strype; but as he had occasion to write two letters upon the cases referred to him, which contain some passages, illustrative of his feelings upon certain points of importance, we feel compelled to advert to them. The first relates to two graces, obtained surreptitiously as it is alleged, against the Masters and Heads of Colleges, by the Vice Chancellor and Doctors of the town, and infringing a public statute. Though the letter is a much longer one than we should wish to introduce into the body of this work, and has been already printed by Strype from aquit you from the Pope's excommunication and curse? Shall ye not rather stain yourselves and your noble houses with a suspicion of heresy and treason? In which case if the Catholic heir to the royal crown call upon the execution of the laws of the Church, you shall for the maintenance of heresy, lose your goods, your lands, your honours; and undo your wives, your children, and your houses for ever. 'God is not mocked.' The longer it is before he punish, the more hard and severe shall his punishment be. Do you not see before your eyes, that because King Henry the Eighth brake the unity of Christ's Church, his house is now cut off and ended? and think you that maintaining the heresy which he began, you shall not bring your own houses to the like end that he hath?"—Feb. 21. 1580.—Mr. Ellis, who has printed this letter in the third volume of his 2d series of Original Letters, has noticed another in the same collection of MSS. from some unknown person to the King of Spain, entreating his interest with the Pope to procure Sanders to be made a Cardinal. He has printed the Pope's Bull for James Fitz-Moris, indorsed by Lord Burghley, "Bulla contra Reginam." 1577.

* Whatever credit the Ministers of Elizabeth may deserve for counteracting the intrigues and designs of her many enemies, they were yet not capable of entirely guarding against deception, as may be seen in the case of Parry, who, in the course of this and other years, was evidently practising with Lord Burghley himself, as may be seen in Strype, though at present we cannot enter further into the history of his deceptions.

the original, yet, as it is eminently calculated to shew the great care, prudence, and resolution, with which he [Lord Burghley] interposed in the affairs of the learned Society over which he presided, we cannot avoid copying it at length, as one specimen out of many. His Lordship had previously referred the matter to the judgment of Archbishop Grindal, who, in the answer he returned, had written, "Now when your Lordship is desirous to know mine opinion for quieting and ordering of this contention, I know your Lordship of yourself can best do it; and I count the University happy that it hath you for Chancellor in these unquiet times.—Your wisdom and authority may work more good with them than could be done otherwise.—I do greatly commend the sentences of humility and submission contained in the letters of the University to your Lordship. Lambeth, June 30, 1580."

"To the Vice Chancellor and Heads of Colleges, &c.

"After our very hearty and loving commendations, we wish unto you all, in general and particular, the grace of God's Spirit, to lead and conserve you in concord and peace. So as the knowledge of God may increase among you, that by your altercations and dissensions, the enemies of learning and the gospel have not just occasion to rejoice thereof; and spread abroad slanderous reports to the defamation of the whole body of your famous University.

"And not without cause do I simply begin to write, that from the bottom of my heart, perceiving as I have done by late letters received, sealed with your common seal, and subscribed in the name of you, the Vice Chancellor and senate; and other letters also from all the Heads and Masters of Colleges, subscribed with their own proper names; that there has arisen some cloud, containing a matter of some tempest of controversy among you. Which, if by some favourable wind of admonition, in God's name, the Father of peace, if it be not blown over, or dispersed, is like to pour out upon the whole body of that University some contagious and pestilent humour of contention, sedition, or some worse thing than I will name.

"And upon the receipt of these contradictory letters, and perusing the grounds and causes thereof, I was somewhat comforted, in that both parties had so courteously and reverently (which I mean in respect of the office I have, to be your Chancellor) referred the order and direction of all these begun controversies to my censure. Wherein although I think by direct laws, ordinances, and ancient customs of that University, I might challenge to myself such a power so to do; yet I cannot but very thankfully and comfortably accept this your courteous and loving manner of yielding to be ordered by me. And therefore, I have been more careful how to discharge myself herein. For which purpose, without using any prejudicial conceit of judgment, by mine own consideration of the cause, I did, by my special letters, partly recommend this controversy, and the whole cause to the most reverend father in God, my very good Lord, the Archbishop of Canterbury's grace; requiring him both to consider of your letters, and to hear as well Mr. D. Barrow, coming with the letters from you, the Vice Chancellor; as Mr. D. Howland, master of St. John's College, coming from all the Heads of Colleges; and to peruse the statutes mentioned in this controversy. And to call to his Grace also some persons of experience in such University matters. Which I perceive, and so Mr. D. Barrow can inform you, his Grace hath done very diligently and painfully, as by his letters his Grace hath signified; declaring to me, at good length, what either party hath alleged for maintenance or disallowance of the two motions called graces; whereupon the controversies have principally arisen. And thereupon his Grace hath plainly imparted to me what he thinketh thereof. Wherewith, after some further consideration of the particular chapter of the statutes, against which the graces have been preferred, I do concur. And so, although verbally I have pronounced mine opinion to be, the foresaid doctors being the messengers at this time, whom I think sufficient to declare the same unto either part; yet I have thought myself not discharged in conscience and office, without also expressing my censure and determination, as your Chancellor and chief officer. In writing which I most earnestly require you per omnes charitates to accept, as from one that herein am touched with no particular affection towards any person; but in the sight of God, whose assistance by the Spirit of peace I have invoked, I do declare my mind as followeth: which, as your Chancellor, I require to be obeyed and allowed.

"I do think and judge it meet and necessary, that the two late graces should be reputed as void and none. Whereof one was a motion to have all other Doctors that are Heads of Colleges, in the pointing or pricking of officers; though by the statutes the same be expressly limited to the Heads. The second was, that Doctors in divinity should be compellible to preach as frequently as other younger divines. Which two, called by you graces, though indeed dis-graces to the Queen's Majesties statutes, may percase not be in precise words well avouched; because the same I have not present with me at the writing hereof; yet my meaning is manifest unto you, that I do deem and adjudge them to be void, and not to be accepted, as things to bind any person thereby. And though I have and do see many reasons to move me hereunto, whereof I have expressed some to Mr. D. Barrow, and that I hope there will be none so unruly among you as to impugn this my sentence; yet as briefly as I may in a letter, I will touch to you a few reasons, as followeth.

"First, I cannot allow to have any decrease attempted, to please a multitude, to the violation or alteration of any her Majesties statutes, so lately with great deliberation and advice made; and by that whole University accepted and approved; except there shall be better consideration aforehand had, then was in those proceedings. Wherein I may not forget to remember you, that in respect of the office I have to be your high officer, and have never shewn myself careless of your causes, it had been at this time meet and convenient, and so hereafter ought to be, to have made me first acquainted; and to have had my clear consent, as well to the violating or changing of your statutes, as I was at first the principal author to procure them to be made. And though I perceive, and hear by some report, that some of you have in your defence alleged that you had heretofore on your part moved this matter to me, as indeed you did, and that I had allowed thereof, which is not so; I omit words of worse sense, to control such reporters. And some hath, as I hear in open assembly alleged, that I did to that end write my letters to Mr. D. Howland, then Vice Chancellor, which he was charged to have suppresst; I am sorry in this my common letter to you all, to be constrained to use some sharper speech than my nature alloweth of, to be contained in a letter from a Chancellor to his loving scholars, as generally I esteem you to be; my speeches shall only touch the private persons, who have forgotten their duties, to allege an untruth against me. And not content to speak of me untruly, being absent; but have hazarded rashly their credit against D. Howland, that was Vice Chancellor, charging him with suppression of my letters. But in few words I affirm, that I never did consent to this motion; neither did I write any such letters to D. Howland for that purpose.

"When Mr. D. Hatcher, and I think his son-in-law D. Lougher, and D. Barrow, as I remember, moved me herein; and added another matter, that the Vice Chancellor and Heads of Colleges did not use to make the Oppidan Doctors acquainted with the University causes; I answered, that I thought it reasonable they should be called, as other of their degrees were, to be made acquainted with the causes of the University. But to have authority with the Heads in causes against the statute, I never asserted. But I said I would speak with the Heads of Colleges therein ; as I did, and found good cause in my opinion, as yet I do, to the contrary. And that is principally, because I think the statute very good, as it is, to reduce the nomination of these kind of public officers to be done by a number ; neither too few, for lack of consideration ; nor committed unto too many, for fear of confusion. And none other can I think than the Heads of Colleges, or in their absence their vicegerents; who are to be thought to have best knowledge of their companies, both for discretion and learning ; and fewer do I not think, than all the Heads of the Colleges, lest some Colleges might lack preferment. And contrariwise to increase this multitude by foreign Doctors, that have not domicilia fixa, but are here and there at their pleasures; and have not either special care or certain knowledge of the learning and discretion of scholars in colleges, must needs carry an absurdity two ways. The one is, that the number of such extraordinary or extravagant Doctors may exceed the number of the Heads, to control their censures grounded upon knowledge. The second is, that there may be by faction drawn a devotion of scholars from their Heads, to serve the appetites of foreigners; and so leave their own fathers for step-fathers.

" But because I see I should exceed the limits of a letter, if I should prosecute this matter, I will alter my purpose with concluding my former sentence for both the graces : which without the allegations of any arguments ought to be accepted in favour of continuance of laws, against any that will take the office to abrogate : which you know how in some commonwealths were so disliked, as they were ordered to speak thereof with ropes about their necks : you can tell why. And yet I do not, like a stoic, maintain this opinion ; but I do know how the same may be limited in times and places.

" As for the intention of your last grace, to compel Doctors to preach more oftener, than by constraint they need ; I like well of all voluntary actions ; especially in such action as preaching is. Wherein I think admonition more convenient than to make new laws so suddenly against laws in use. And so far forth am I moved to have them preach, as I wish them to lose the name and preferment of Doctors, that will leave the office of Doctors ; which is by etymology to teach.

" I must now add with my most hearty exhortation to move you all to concord ; and to shew your earnestness in observing the laws which you have ; and especially to be more careful for government of the youth, being by common report far out of order, in following all sensuality in sundry things that I will not now name. For I should then speak of sundry things ungrateful to hear; and yet not unknown to you that are Heads of Colleges, nor to you that by marriage are heads of families."

The other case referred to his particular judgment and decision, related to an order sent to the Vice Chancellor by the Bishop of Ely for the observance of a public fast, which some of the University fancied could not be complied with, without offence to her Majesty, as savouring too much of Puritanism. The occasion seems to have been, according to Strype, "the mighty preparations making abroad by the Pope, and his sworn confederates of the Holy Land, to invade this land, of which news came from all parts, and to this Bishop in particular, from his friends in Helvetia." Without pretending to be fully informed of all the circumstances, and adverting only to the great duty of fasting and occasional abstinence, his Lordship thus expresses himself:

"If the same may be done, as his Lordship writeth, in all order and comeliness, I think that there can be no just offence taken thereat. I were greatly overseen, if I should not allow both of fasts and exhortation thereto: and I think the same ought to be accompanied with two elder sisters, although I find no mention thereof in the Bishop's letter: that is, of prayers, which are for all persons to use; whereas fasting is not expedient for all persons; and the second is alms in relieving the poor; which is the action of the rich, and therein I think my Lord himself will begin the example most abundantly.

"I, as a public Counsellor of the realm, cannot warrant by my directions in the Church, but that which I find established by the laws of the realm, or by the usual practice of the Church;* as by direction from the Metropolitan, or by

* We find him expressing the same feeling with regard to a fast proposed to be kept at Stamford, a place peculiarly belonging to him, and of which he had received information from the Alderman of the town, to whom he wrote accordingly, that "although he commended the preacher's zeal towards that town, to move them to such divine actions, as fasting and hearing of sermons, yet, considering this was an action that might seem an innovation in the orders of the church; which were known how they were established by Parliament, without any other innovation to be admitted; at the least no such matter should be attempted to be practised by any private person, out of the diocese and place where he hath cure; nor yet in any other Bishop's diocese, without the prescription of the Bishop, or ordinary, or their permission. That he had thought good for the avoiding of offence, and because the borough of Stamford was his inheritance, to require and advise him to give the preacher (Mr. Johnson) warning to forbear from any such attempt in that town, though if he were disposed there to preach, he might do so, if he had, as by likelihood he might have, license of the Bishop of the diocese, as any other might do,

Synod, approbated by the Queen's Majesty's authority, as head governor. And if the form which my Lord of Ely shall prescribe, or his delegates shall devise, may accord with any of these authorities, I wish it should take place, and wish it good success: to move Almighty God to mercy, and to forgive us by the means of the three actions: that is our offence in gluttony by fasting: our general in all, and particularly, abusing the plentifulness of his word, by invocation and repentance in public prayers: and thirdly in abuse of our wealth, by distributing alms to the poor.

"All which three actions I think so necessary, as without we be by some means more moved thereto, than I can see we are yet disposed of ourselves: surely we ought by God's justice to fear the withdrawing of all that wherein we now abound; that is, in all bodily and ghostly food; and, thirdly, in worldly wealth.

"But in what sort these good exercises shall be begun and continued, I must leave to the direction of the preacher, who can best tell how to apply the same, not all in one sort, for as I said, I think every person, without difference, is not to be enjoined to fast, for I am sorry to consider how many poor people are forced to fast for lack, and among the scholars, I know a great number are very near the same, for lack of allowance of diet; as I think there are in some Colleges a number that have too great an allowance: and if I were to give my advice, surely such would be moved to abstinence, and to employ their increase of allowance to such as lack, and so at one time there should be both fasting and alms exercised.* As for prayer and invocation for mercy, I know there is none to be excepted or exempted. Well, good Mr. Vice Chancellor, bear with my hasty writing: for I cannot but wish well to this action, and hope that the preachers will do herein their offices as preachers and exhorters, not as devisers or commanders of new orders in the church, lest thereby, in meaning well, they having license; adding, that if the said Alderman found it meet, he might do well to exhort men to fast and pray, being two necessary actions for Christian men to use."

* These remarks on the duty of fasting are certainly very noticeable as proceeding from the pen of Lord Burghley, and at such a time, many having totally abandoned that religious exercise, in consequence of the abuse of it by the Papists, and the Puritans stretching the points, in some cases, too far the other way, so as to give offence, by the too great preciseness of their observances, and some novelties introduced. Lord B. has wisely shewn the necessary adjuncts of a sincere abstinence and humiliation, and left a reasonable liberty to persons in the observance of a duty, that ought to be in itself, as to any really good purposes, free and voluntary.

may yet by novelty give cause of offence. From Richmond, the 15th of September, 1580. "Your friend,

"W. BURGHLEY."*

Oxford at this time appears to have been in much worse repute than Cambridge, "all good order and discipline despoiled; the fervour of study extinguished; the public lectures for the most part abandoned; the taverns and ordinary tables frequented; the apparel of students grown monstrous; the statutes and good ordinances of the University and Colleges infringed; scholarships and fellowships sold for money." This account is taken from a book, indeed, which we should be loth to cite as of absolute authority, we mean Leicester's Commonwealth, which appears to have been published about this time; but as the author appeals to facts supposed to be notorious, and past contradiction, it is impossible not to suppose that he had some warrant for what he so strongly affirms, otherwise his prejudice against Leicester is so marked, that it might seem invidious to deduce any particular testimonies in favour of Lord Burghley, from a work that imputes all the disorders of Oxford, "to the chief Governor thereof [Leicester†], who being an Atheist himself," says the author, "useth the place only for gain and spoil;" and, in a comparison he draws between the two Chancellors, he thus speaks of both: "If there were not other things to declare the odds and differences between him [Leicester, Chancellor of Oxford], and him [Burghley, Chancellor of Cambridge], which he cannot bear; so that every way he [the Earl of Leicester], sees him to pass him in all honour and virtue; it were sufficient to behold the present state of the two Universities, whereof they are heads and governors. Let the thing speak for itself. Consider the fruit of the garden, and thereby you may judge of the gardener's diligence. On the one side look upon the bishoprics, pastorships, and pulpits of England, and see whence principally they have received their furniture for the advance-

* Lord Burghley was written to also by the Bishop of Ely, to have the new statutes prepared for St. John's College (of which his Lordship had been a member, and was still a great friend and patron to it), finished and established, the College being in much disorder for the want of them. The Bishop apologises, in his letter, for troubling him in such matters: "Scio enim quam undique maximis variisque negotiis adhuc obrueris atque involveris." ment of the gospel; and, on the other side, look upon the seminaries of Papistry at Rome and Rheims, upon the Colleges of Jesuits, and other companies of Papists beyond the seas, and see whence they are especially wrought."*

† Leicester was chosen Chancellor of Oxford, December 3, 1564, on the resignation of Sir John Mason, and continued Chancellor till his death, in 1588. At one period of his Chancellorship, he certainly had the credit of attending much to the promotion of learning there.—See Zouch's Life of Sir Philip Sidney, p. 30, from Nichols's Progresses; see also Life of Leicester, 1727. London, 30, 31, &c.

In our first volume, ch. xxii. anno 1549, and in ch. xlix. under the year 1554, we had occasion to speak of that excellent woman Catherine Duchess of Suffolk, as a friend of Lord Burghley, and one who was under obligations to him for particular attentions during the reigns both of Edward and Mary; as she was constantly ready to acknowledge. We spoke also of her troubles in the trying times of the Marian persecution (vol. i. p. 646); of her being compelled to leave the kingdom with her second husband, Mr. Bertie, and being delivered of a son, whom, in allusion to their wanderings and sojournment in strange places abroad, she had christened Peregrine. The Duchess inherited the estates of the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, her father, and Mr. Bertie her husband had claimed the title, to qualify him for services due to the Bishop of Durham; but the Queen would not allow of it. This year (1580), on the death of the Duchess, the controversy seems to have been revived, and Mr. Peregrine Bertie the son, actually assumed the title, and applied to the Lord Treasurer, to reconcile the Queen to it, if possible, and, as he wrote, "to pilot him over the tempestuous sea" he had to pass. "In case your Honour," as he wrote, "shall of your friendly disposition towards me, and justice, safely pilot me over this tempestuous sea, you shall confidently account, that thereby you have erected a pillar in your own building, which shall never shrink or fail you for any stone whatsoever." His Lordship appears to have interested himself greatly for him, as the Queen consented to admit him to the Barony, and to the place and honour thereunto belonging, even in the life-time of his father, "by the mouth of Sir William Cecil, Knight, Lord Burghley," as Collins states it, and of the other Commissioners who had been appointed to examine his claims.—Collins, art. Bertie, Duke of Ancaster.

* This seems to be confirmed by a reference to the history of the times. The most active of the seminary Priests appear to have been Oxford men; the most eminent among the Bishops from Cambridge. Of Lord Burghley's great attention to men of learning and merit, a proof occurred this year, in the promotion of William Whitaker, B.D. of Trinity College, Cambridge, to be Chancellor of St. Paul's; and this, as it would appear, unexpectedly, and partly in compliment to that eminent divine, Dr. Alexander Nowell, whose nephew he was. See his letter of thanks to Lord Burghley, dated from Trinity College, 15th September, 1580, in Strype's Annals, ii. 392.

This young Nobleman had been early recommended to the notice and care of Lord Burghley, "by the earnest desire of his pious mother the Duchess," who, in her anxiety about him, had, so lately as in the year 1577, entreated Lord Burghley to get him from the Court, where he was leading rather a wild life; "to give him good counsel, bridle his youth, and help dispatch him to his father in the country, while (as she trusted) all was well." Not that he was by all accounts much addicted to the Court, as a Court; on the contrary, he used to boast that he was none of the reptilia, and that it was not his element.—See Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia. Being warlike and militarily disposed, as Strype says, he made a considerable figure afterwards, as we may have occasion to shew.

The Queen does not appear to have taken her usual Progress this year, being unwell in July, or perhaps for other reasons. Mary Queen of Scots was wanting to go again to Buxton, but it seemed very difficult to obtain leave. It appears to have been first proposed by Lord Shrewsbury in a letter to Lady Burghley, delivered to the latter by Lord Shrewsbury's agent in London, Bawdewyn, and who was commissioned to make the following reply: that Lady Burghley had communicated with Lord Burghley upon the subject, who had told her that the Queen was not disposed to such a journey, and that for his better satisfaction, she had desired Lord Burghley himself to speak with him, who gave him an account of his having moved the matter to the Queen, whom he found resolutely bent against the going to Chatsworth,* and "by reason of the busy affairs wherewith she was troubled, and her sickness, the opportunity did not serve to proceed any farther on that behalf, which he would (otherwise) very willingly do." And the writer adds, "Howbeit he gave me this advertisement, that if her Majesty should perceive that either your Honour [Lord Shrewsbury] or my Lady were earnest suitors to obtain licence, she would conceive a mislike of you for the same, and so did wish me to let you understand." We may, however, collect from a letter written by the Earl to Lord Burghley, that before the month was out, he had arrived at Buxton with his charge.—Lodge, ii. 239. The taking her to Chatsworth seems to have been the chief difficulty.

The Queen's conduct with regard to the Shrewsbury family at this time, was certainly very extraordinary, and has something mysterious in it to this day, as Mr. Lodge, in his Illustrations of English History, has very rightly observed.†

* Chatsworth as well as Buxton was mentioned.

† Lodge, ii. p. 244, note †.

It plainly appears from many of the Earl's letters, that after his eleven or twelve years' hard service in the "painful and careful" charge committed to him, he was now to be straightened in his allowance, to his great loss* and inconvenience, and as he apprehended, to his discredit with the world,† as he tells Lord Burghley in a letter dated July xxvi, two days only before his removal with the Queen of Scots from Sheffield to Buxton.‡

Having spoken of this unhappy Princess, it may not be amiss here to take a short view of what was passing at this time in her disturbed country, in judging of which we ought to look not so much to the persons principally concerned, as to the objects at stake. It is often made a reproach against Elizabeth and her Council, that they could not only openly support the King against his mother, and the King's party against the Nobility on the Queen's side, but the Regency and government of so bad a man, as Morton, against all.—But, Morton's character perhaps had little or nothing to do with the course taken by the English Government; the great object undoubtedly was to keep the King on the side of the Protestants, and out of the hands of the avowed enemies of England. From the time of Henry VIII. as we took some pains to shew, in our first volume, the struggle was not between the English and Scots, but between the English and the French in Scotland; Scotland was looked to by both countries as the stepping-stone of France towards England, in the early part of the century, and it remained so to the very end, and with regard to the Government of James or Mary, the great point to be considered was, which might be most likely to keep up an amity with England, and resist, as a national concern, all foreign influence. Under Murray, Lennox, and, if not so certainly under Mar, under Morton as his successor, the young King was likely to continue in friendship with England, and on the side of Protestantism. The contrary of which must have taken place, in the natural course of things, had Mary been restored; England could have no other right to detain or depose her but the right of self-defence. It is true, there was another competition on foot, between England and France, as to their

* Among his losses Lord Shrewsbury reckons the spoiling and wilful wasting of all things provided for the service of the Queen of Scots.

† In Murdin, 346, some reasons are given for the curtailment of certain expenses at this time, arising out of the Irish and Scotch affairs.

‡ At the outset of this journey the Queen it seems had an ugly accident from the starting of her horse, which occasioned her to fall, whereby she hurt her back, of which, says his Lordship, "she still complains, notwithstanding she applies the bath once or twice a day."

several connexions with and claims upon Scotland. France stood upon the ground of an ancient alliance, to give her a right to interfere with the internal concerns of Scotland, England on a feudal superiority: neither of these can be considered now as very solid claims, but perhaps the latter would never have been so insisted upon during the sixteenth century, except to counteract the plea and pretence of France. If France upon the claim of alliance would interfere, to the hazard of England, it was natural in the latter to revive a plea also for interference, and the claim of a paramount authority, was not altogether so unfounded a claim as many have pretended. Still, however, the competition and contest was with France; and perhaps, it might rather be said, with all the Catholic powers of Europe. As long as the King could be kept on the side of England, there was a strong Anti-gallican party there, and a Protestant party; and these were the main objects; Mary's principles were all the other way, hence the danger to be apprehended from her release; a danger undoubtedly reaching to the crown, and consequently to the life of Elizabeth, as well as to the Protestant Church of both kingdoms. But about the time of which we are now writing, some alarming circumstances occurred in Scotland, chiefly affecting the King; though directed in the first instance against Morton, who had rendered himself justly odious by many most tyrannical acts; and was the more to be dreaded, because he might be expected to depend much on the continuation of his Regency, the King being only in the twelfth year of his age, when the first important movements against him took place in the years 1577, 1578; and when the King, by the advice and support of a large confederacy of Nobles, was induced to take the government into his own hands; on which occasion, making a virtue of laying down his office, he procured an act to be passed, approving of his previous government, accompanied with a pardon from the King for all past offences, crimes, and treasons; but this did not avail him in the end, though for a time it enabled him to recover some degree of power, through the unpopularity of several of the other party, and to get possession once more of the King's person, by a stratagem.

There had lately come into Scotland from France, a very suspicious person, qualified in many ways to obtain an influence over the mind of the young King, and adverse in all likelihood to the hopes and prospects of England. Such was the celebrated Esme Stuart of the house of Lennox; D'Aubigny, as he was called in France, a title drawn from a territory granted to his ancestors in the time of Charles VII. and continued in the Lennox family to this day; he was nephew to the

Regent Lennox, and therefore nearly related to the King; he was a young man, if not of depraved, yet of rather dissipated manners, with all outward accomplishments, calculated to turn the King aside from the austerities of the Scotch Kirk, and make him sensible of the restraint put upon him by the power of the Regent. Though by extraction Scotch, the young d'Aubigny was by birth a Frenchman, and on his first coming into Scotland, an undoubted Papist; he was besides notoriously connected with the Guises, Mary's powerful but bigoted relatives, the great adversaries of Elizabeth in all points of view. A writer,* much on the side of Mary, affirms, that he was actually sent over, by the Guises, at the express desire of the captive Queen, to be near her son, and Dr. Stuart also allows that he had a commission from the heads of that family, who were losing their power in France, to undermine the Earl of Morton and the English interest. The clergy, as might be expected, evinced great concern, lest he should positively convert the King; to obviate which suspicions, he pretended to have been, on the contrary, converted to Protestantism, but as letters of dispensation from Rome had been intercepted, permitting Roman Catholics to make profession of any faith they chose, to carry on their purposes, of secretly advancing the interests of the Roman See, it seemed impossible to regard his conversion as sincere. He was not long in so fascinating the mind of the young King, as very visibly to turn him away from all his former pursuits, purposes, and connexions; while honours and appointments were heaped upon himself. He was made Lord Aberbrothwick, Earl, and lastly Duke of Lennox, Lord Chamberlain, and Captain of Dunbriton, or Dunbarton Castle, a place admirably situated either to receive strangers from abroad, or convey the King away.†

It is impossible for us to enter so far into the history of these occurrences, as to convey any adequate idea of the confusion occasioned by his coming, the influence he obtained with the King, and the party he formed there. But the aspect of affairs as regarded England may be judged of from the remonstrances of the English minister Randolph, as they are to be seen in many books; and though the interference of this able Minister, with the affairs of Scotland, will never be forgiven by those who do not see deeply into the designs, perpetually and incessantly on foot, during the reign of Elizabeth, against all that Englishmen (and we may surely add Scotchmen) now pride themselves upon, yet by those who are willing to acquaint themselves with the hidden as well as the avowed purposes, of the Continental Catholic powers, at this period, the English state papers of all descriptions will be perused with great attention, as the best remaining clues not only to what was actually passing, or effectually brought to pass, but to what, by being timely checked or counteracted, never came to pass.

* Scott.

† It was very much expected, that a plan was on foot to procure the King to leave Scotland, and to marry him to a Papist.

The remonstrances of Randolph against what was now visibly on foot, being too long to introduce here, we can only refer to such passages as have a plain political bearing upon the conduct of Elizabeth and England as regarded Scotland. It was alleged that every effort had been made, "to save Scotland from the conquest of France;" that opportunities and seasons had occurred in which Elizabeth might have availed herself of the distracted state of that country and conquered it, but that she had never sought for the possession of "a foot's breadth of the ground of Scotland," that she had endeavoured to "preserve the King and his country, by reason he was her nearest kinsman, her nearest neighbour, in one island; and that few other Princes in the world agreed with them and their subjects, in professing one religion." That the Regent, the King, and herself had acted together to the end abovementioned, "until now of late within this year or more, that the Lord d'Aubigny, being purposely sent thither to dissolve that happy amity and love between their Majesties, had so far prevailed, that he was become master of his Grace's person, of his ear, of his counsel, and of his whole estate. That he had alienated his Grace's mind from the amity of England, and to think nothing pleasant but the motion of France: from whence he never got good turn, nor so much as to call him King." These are some of the most striking passages that occur in Randolph's memorable "declaration," as Elizabeth's Ambassador to the states of Scotland, and which concludes as follows;

"Thus, my very good Lords, the care I have of the King himself, the love I bear unto your country, the inconveniences like to follow on both, the likelihood of the overthrow of religion in time, and the breach of amity between the two realms, moveth me thus earnestly to speak; and further, to proceed otherwise than I would, if I had not to do with those whom I both honour, love, and am ready to serve."

Besides d'Aubigny, there were others now placed about the King who are said to have abused his good-nature, encouraged him in delights and pleasures unfit for his age, and unseemly for a Prince: their names may be seen in Strype. It is no wonder that the English Ambassador should fare ill amongst such counsellors; he was compelled, indeed, to depart the kingdom, for fear of his life, having been, as it were, proscribed, and once even fired at.

But there was one who went farther even than these—James Stuart, son to the Lord Ochiltree, a decided enemy to Morton; of "a high courage, but ambitious, cruel, covetous, prodigal, and imperious."* Between these two favourites and their advisers, the King was certainly in great danger of being brought to renounce those principles, on which were founded the hopes of England's safety, the consolidation of the two kingdoms, or their perpetual amity, as equally seceders from the Church of Rome, and therewith equally opposed to the Catholic continental powers, then generally at war with the Reformed, and sworn to do their utmost, jointly or severally, to extirpate heresy, or, in other words, Protestantism.

Having thus shewn what were the actual dangers which seemed at this time to threaten England, from the new company into which the young King of Scotland had fallen, and the great objects at stake, we shall proceed to say something of Ireland. We are not, indeed, obliged to say much of it in the course of this history, as immediately dependent upon the counsel or advice of Lord Burghley, many things appearing to have been conducted and carried on there, during this reign, rather contrary to, than accordant with, his plans and wishes. Still, what was continually passing there, was calculated to give countenance and support to the general measures of his administration, since there it was that the factions of the Pope were incessantly at work, and had more scope given them so to act, as to leave no doubt of the disposition of the Catholic powers, if they could ever have got a firm footing there, whereby afterwards they might have been enabled to pass into Scotland and England. Ireland has always been open to the intrigues of the enemies of England, as well as of Protestantism, and hard has been the task, since the first commencement of the Reformation, to keep it so attached to this country, as to prevent its being betrayed into foreign hands. The Pope originally assumed a power of giving it to England, and it is not to be wondered, that when the latter country fell off from the Pope, the offended Pontiff should feel disposed to reclaim his gift, and, through his emissaries and allies, to make Ireland a perpetual scene of disturbance and contention, in hopes of embarrassing England in all her movements towards a further reformation. In addition, therefore, to the troubles continually brought upon the Government by the feuds and animosities, and frequent rebellions of the native chieftains and Lords of that disordered and half-civilized nation, Rome and Spain were for ever on the watch for opportunities of attacking England, or helping their Popish friends in Scotland, through Ireland. Elizabeth, in the course of her reign, was represented by many deputies, and by some who appear to have understood Ireland, and the Irish people, well; but these were by far the fewest of those who were sent thither, and the turbulent chieftains who were likely to be thwarted by their superior knowledge and discernment, managed to find such favour with Elizabeth, by pretended submissions, as to get them removed; which, having accomplished, and less efficient Governors being sent in their room, they soon rebelled afresh, and Elizabeth being always sparing both of troops and money, to quell such distant tumults, things continued in this state during most of her reign. Camden, in his history, has, under almost every year of Elizabeth's reign, described the state of Ireland, as it then was; and to his account of things, as the shortest we know, the reader may, in general, be referred. We have noticed, under the year 1576, the attention paid, both by Elizabeth and her great minister, Lord Burghley, to the complaints of the Irish against the too rigorous exaction of the tax, called the cess; but nothing seemed capable of bringing that divided country into a state of quiet: as soon as any tumults were quelled in one province, a rebellion broke out in the others, and not a year passed without insurrections in the North, South, East, or West, followed by feigned submissions and fresh insurrections, to the incessant disturbance of the Government.

In the year 1578, there seems undoubtedly to have been a design on foot, by Rome and Spain, of sending forces to Ireland under Stukely, and which were only stayed by the death of the latter in Africa, of which we have before spoken. In the year following, however, a new rebellion was attempted by James Fitzmorris, a man "never well but in troubles," as Camden says of him, who having returned to France, after a former submission, had offered, if the French King would assist him, to unite all Ireland to the sceptre of France, or restore the Romish religion in that island;* but receiving no encouragement from that Court, he went thence to Spain, with the same offers; but the Spaniard sent him to Rome, where having obtained some money through the interference of Sanders and Allan, the one an English, and the other an Irish priest, with the authority of a Legate for Sanders, a consecrated banner, and letters of recommendation, he returned to Spain, and set sail with a few ships for Ireland; the two divines bearing him company. He landed in Kerry, and was joined by the Earl of Desmond, who, after the death of Fitzmorris, which soon happened, continued in rebellion, taking the Spaniards to his assistance, and boldly affirming, when admonished to lay down his arms,* that he had undertaken the protection of the Catholic faith in Ireland, and that by authority from the Bishop of Rome, and direction of the Catholic King; and indeed he was not long after, reinforced by the arrival of some Italian and Spanish soldiers, under the command of San Josepho, an Italian, sent by the Pope and Philip, under pretence of restoring the Romish religion, but rather to draw away the attention of England from the Low Countries. They were indeed only 700 in number, but they had brought arms for 5000, and gave out that many more were expected, and much money. Having raised a fort in haste, for their security, a trumpeter was sent to demand, "who they were, what they had to do in Ireland, who sent them, and why they had built a fort in Queen Elizabeth's kingdom, and withal commanding them to depart with all speed. They answered they were sent, some from the most holy father, the Pope, and some from the Catholic King of Spain, to whom the Pope had given Ireland, since the Queen had justly forfeited her title to it for heresy; they would therefore hold what they had gotten, and get more if they could."—But they came to a sad end; for all but the commanders were slain promiscuously, after having yielded themselves, and the Irish rebels found amongst them hanged. Camden has given the reasons for this unfortunate massacre, at which, it is said, the Lord Deputy (Lord Grey) shed tears, and the Queen wished it had not been done, and could with difficulty be made to believe, that it was at all necessary or reasonable.†

* He had been, towards the end of the year 1579, proclaimed traitor, for having dealt with foreign Princes, for the conquest and destruction of his native country, relieved Sanders and James Fitzmorris rebels, harboured the Spaniards, hanged up divers faithful subjects of the Queen, displayed the Pope's banner, and brought foreigners into the realm.

† It was in a sally the Spaniards made from this fort, that Lord Burghley lost his nephew (by his first marriage), the son of his great friend, Sir John Cheke; "a comely and courageous young gentleman," Camden calls him, who laments his death. A further account of him may be seen in our first volume, pp. 745, 746. We may add, that it was in this assault upon Ireland, by the Italians and Spaniards, that Sir Walter Raleigh was first entrusted with a command.

As far as Lord Burghley was concerned in what was passing in Ireland at this period, we have an account from his own pen, and may discover, where, in his estimation, the fault lay; for thus he wrote, not long after, to the Master of the Rolls in that kingdom, Sir Nicholas White, with whom he generally corresponded.

"I do heartily lament the lamentable state of that country; and the more I am therewith grieved, in that I see the calamity to continue, or not to diminish; and yet I see no way how to remedy it; neither in so doubtful opinions as there are both there and here, for the remedy, dare I lay hold of any of them. And yet I do not think the remedy is desperate, if good and wise men, addicted to public state, were therein employed.* And thus uncomfortably I end; referring the success to God's mercy, to be extended both to you and us." He had before written to him, "The will of God be done, to the maintenance of his glory, and to the preservation of that crown upon her head, where it ought by justice only to stand." We have seen that the Pope had just before transferred it to the King of Spain. Ireland, indeed, at this time was such a constant source of danger, expense, and embarrassment to England, that Walsingham is reported frequently to have wished it to sink in the sea.†

There was, this year, a further endeavour made to frame a general confession for all the Protestant Churches, or rather a harmony of confessions. Such a design had been set on foot in 1577, at which time the Queen appears actually to have nominated a Minister to attend the Council at Frankfort, assembled for the purpose, but it was found to be a more difficult point to settle than had been at first apprehended. The account of these proceedings may be seen in Strype, particularly in a letter from Gualter of Zurich, to Archbishop Grindal, dated March 8, 1580.‡—Annals, ii. Appendix, b. ii. No. xxix. It begins oddly enough, considering the subject, though we fear too truly. "In Germania passim dissentiones dat Formula Concordiæ, &c." In fact, he calls it afterwards, "infelix illa discordis Concordiæ formula." The project of a harmony of confessions, was approved, it seems, by Prince Casimir, and was to consist of a collection, as it were, of all the doctrines in which the several Churches actually agreed, with notes to illustrate such parts as might appear to labour under some obscurity. But for a further account of these things, the reader must consult our references above.

On the 3d of November, 1580, the famous navigator Drake, returned to Plymouth, after having sailed round the globe in the compass of three years, "to the great admiration of all men," as Camden writes, in whose history is to be found a long account of him.* He was very graciously received by the Queen, who visited him in his ship, named "the Golden Hind," which she afterwards caused to be laid up in a little creek near Deptford, to be preserved as a memorial of his exploits.† It was on board his own ship, that she conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. But we shall have more to say of this celebrated man hereafter.

Twenty-third year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, began Nov. 17, 1580.

On Monday the 16th of January 1581 [or 1580-1], the third sessions of the Parliament first summoned in 1572 began, after twenty-four prorogations; her Majesty was not present at the opening of it, because it was no new Parliament, though it had not met for the dispatch of business since 1575. In the interval between the last and present sessions, both Houses may be said to have lost their Speakers; Sir Robert Bell, Speaker of the House of Commons, having died not long before, and the House of Lords being deprived of the services of that very eminent and great lawyer, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper, as has been before shewn.—It was necessary, therefore, for her Majesty to issue a commission, to signify to the Lower House her will and command, that a new Speaker should be chosen, while Sir Thomas Bromley the new Lord Chancellor, supplied the place of Sir Nicholas Bacon in the Upper House; and on Friday the 20th of January, her Majesty came down in person, the House of Commons in the meanwhile having chosen John Popham, Esq., the Queen's Solicitor, to be their Speaker.

As we have been accustomed to look to the proceedings in Parliament for the most authentic account of the state of the nation, as generally disclosed and made known at such times, and through that particular channel, to the people at large, we shall on this occasion transcribe some parts of the speech of Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, as corroborative of all we have hitherto said, of the great dangers apprehended at this period from abroad; the chief ground of that great credit given to Elizabeth's Counsellors for their continual vigilance, and such a timely foresight of approaching dangers, as was sufficient in the end to frustrate the attempts of the most acute, subtle, and powerful foes, any nation or sovereign had ever to guard against. After recapitulating many past dangers, such as the Northern rebellion, the intrigues of Ridolphi, and the late attempts upon Ireland, he proceeds, "But yet, notwithstanding, seeing our enemies sleep not, it behoveth us not to be careless, as though all were past; but rather to think, that there is but a piece of the storm over, and that the greater part of the tempest remaineth behind, and is like to fall upon us, by the malice of the Pope, the most capital enemy of the Queen and this state. The determinations of the Council of Trent, and the combination of the Pope with other monarchies and princes devoted unto Rome, assuring ourselves that if their powers be answerable to their wills, this realm shall find at their hands, all the miseries and extremities that they can bring upon it. And though by the late good success which God hath given in Ireland, these lewd and malicious enterprises seem for a time as it were to be at a stand; yet let us be assured, that neither their attempts upon Ireland, neither the mischiefs intended against England, will cease thus; but if they find us negligent, they will be ready with greater forces, than have been yet seen. The certain determination which the Pope and his combined friends have to root out the religion of the Gospel in all places, and to begin here as their greatest impediment, is cause sufficient to make us the more vigilant, and to have a wary eye to their doings and proceedings, how smoothly soever they speak or dissemble their friendships for the time; for let us think surely, that they have joined hands together against us, and if they can, they will procure the sparks of the flames that have been so terrible in other countries, to fly over into England, and to kindle as great a fire here. And as the Pope by open hostility, as you see, has shewed himself against her Majesty; so the better to answer in time, the purposes that he hath set down in the mean season till they may come to ripeness, he hath, and doth by secret practices within this realm leave nothing unproved; emboldening many undutiful subjects to stand fast in their disobedience to her Majesty and her laws. For albeit the pure religion of the Gospel hath been freely preached now many years within this realm, yet such have been the practices of the Pope and his secret ministers, as the obstinate and stiff-necked Papist is so far from being reformed, as he has gotten stomach to go backward,* and to shew his disobedience not only in arrogant words but also in contemptuous deeds.

"To confirm them herein and to increase their number you see how the Pope hath and doth comfort their hollow hearts with absolutions, dispensations, reconciliations and such other things of Rome; you see how lately he hath sent hither a sort of hypocrites, naming themselves Jesuits,† a rabble of vagrant

* It is exceedingly well ascertained that in consequence of the fresh excitements given to the Catholics, by what Dr. Lingard has called, "the pouring in of Missionaries" from abroad at this time, many who had hitherto shewn some symptoms of conformity, or acted so as to give no public offence, drew back, and seemed prepared to set the existing laws at defiance. This was the occasion of the present severity, though we cannot but observe, that the Catholic writers themselves seem to admit, that some of the new laws, were enacted only in terrorem, and not generally executed, to the extirpation of the Catholics, as might have been the case.—See Lingard, v. 378.

† I have often had occasion to mention that the whole of the present work, as far as regards the text, was prepared for the press, before I could obtain a sight of Mr. Turner's account of the reign of Elizabeth, published in 1829, it has afforded me an opportunity however, before the whole of my work is printed, of inserting some important references, and I feel particularly anxious, at this period of my history, to notice his account of the Jesuits, their views and practices, in chapter xxxi. of his 2d book, vol. iv. His notes are extremely curious, he gives their history, as the Votorum Quatuor professi; called so indeed by themselves, from the circumstance of their having added, to the three vows of other religious orders, poverty, chastity, and obedience, a fourth special oath to obey the Pope implicitly in all things, as their God upon earth, Numen in terris, (for which he cites some curious authorities, not remote only, but recent, even as low as 1816,) upon the strength of which oath they were to become a militant society, ever moving at his command, to establish his faith and power, wherever he should enjoin them to go and operate; distance, sufferings, laws, governments, dangers or death, were in no case to produce hesitation or disobedience. At first they looked chiefly to the propagation of the faith, by foreign and distant missions, but being accidentally turned aside from a voyage to Palestine, in consequence of the war subsisting between the Turks and the Venetians, Ignatius, and a few of his earliest followers, offered their services to the Pope for the suppression of Protestantism. He shews, that within the compass of only 86 years, a fraternity limited at first by the Pope's Bull to sixty members only, had been increased to nearly 16,000.—The world at large they appear to have divided into Jesuit Provinces, which Mr. Turner enumerates after their own books.—It was in this year that the celebrated Aquaviva became General of the Society.—The following remark of Mr. Turner is too important to be omitted. "The Jesuits may have since disavowed such doctrines, or at least apparently so. But the question was not, in the days of Elizabeth, what this Order would approve, or resolve upon, or choose to sign, one or two centuries afterwards, but what they sanctioned, taught, or were recommending then."

friars newly sprung up and running through the world to trouble the Church of God; whose principal errand is by creeping into the houses of men of behaviour and reputation, not only to corrupt the realm with false doctrine, but also under that pretence to stir up sedition, to the peril of her Majesty and her good subjects. By this you see what cause we have justly to doubt great mischief threatened to this realm."—The remainder of the speech consists chiefly of arguments drawn from the facts adduced, and the abuse of all former lenity, to prove the necessity of providing laws more strict and severe, against all who should still persist in yielding unlimited obedience to the Pope, as well as against such "seditious runnagates," as had lately entered the land, to the disturbance of that "happy peace, which the nation had heretofore enjoyed," for many years; and of raising such forces by sea and land, as might effectually secure the kingdom from foreign invasion; he assured the House that former grants had been insufficient to defray all the expenses of the state, that her Majesty had supplied what was wanting out of her own resources, "shunning thereby loans upon interest, as a most pestilent cancer, able to devour even the estates of Princes."*

Except this speech, which exhibits what may be said to constitute a regular official or ministerial statement of the aspect of affairs, little is to be found in the journals of Parliament of any interest. The Puritanical party, in their endeavours to appoint, as of their own authority, days of fasting and humiliation, received from her Majesty another reprimand, though she was willing to give them credit for their zealous concern for the advancement of religion, and consented to receive from the House, in the form of a petition, an account of such abuses in the Church as were judged to stand in need of reformation; in which also the Bishops appear to have been respectfully consulted, and in many instances to have concurred.† The Queen, it is probable, referred the whole to the Convocation, which, as usual, had been called together at the meeting of the Parliament.

* D'Ewes, pp. 286-7.

† The Petition contained thirteen Articles, which may be seen in Strype's Life of Whitgift, with the Bishops' answers, drawn up principally by Whitgift himself, then Bishop of Worcester.—See his 2d vol. 186, 187. and appendix of Records, [No. iii.] p. 47. The first copy, written and prepared by the Bishop's Secretary, was sent to Lord Burghley before it was published. It is a very important paper; and having been exhibited on the part of the Bishops to the Lord Treasurer, may serve to shew, that his Lordship was by no means regarded as so unfriendly to the Episcopal order, or the established discipline, as some have represented. [See Macdiarmid, who seems disposed to think that even under Edward, Cecil was more inclined to the Genevan plan.] We have sufficiently expressed our opinion, however, upon this head in other places.

Fuller has called it a silent Convocation, but it seems from Strype's account, (Life of Archbishop Grindal, b. ii. ch. xi.) to have been far otherwise. In this Synod a petition was drawn up, to be presented to her Majesty, for the restoration of the Archbishop, who was still in disgrace;* but it had not the desired effect. Of the rest of their proceedings an account may be seen in the work just referred to.

It has been thought that the Queen gave way to the Puritanical party in the enactment of such severe laws against the Papists, in order that by making the former more easy and secure on the score of religion, she might with greater freedom, and less alarm to the nation, renew her negotiations for a marriage with Monsieur. During the last year, the treaty on foot, seems to have made but very little progress on either side, but early in the year 1581, a very splendid embassy was sent into this country by the King of France, to settle the terms of this august alliance, of the completion of which there now seemed to be a pretty general expectation. In Lord Burghley's Diary, the arrival of these envoys extraordinary is thus noticed.

"1581. April. The Commissioners sent from the French Kyng, to treat of marriage for Monsieur the King's brother, the Prince Dolphin, Maresh. de Cosse, Monsieur Lansack, Monsieur de * * of Normandy, Monsieur la Motte, President Brisson, Secretary Pynard."

They are rather differently named in a letter from Lord Leicester to Lord Shrewsbury, to be seen in Lodge's Illustrations of British History, vol. ii. No. cxlii, dated April 19,† where may also be found in a note subjoined, a par-

* The Bishop of London presided in his stead, but the Archbishop appears to have communicated much with the Convocation, and to have suggested many articles of reformation.

† In this letter of Leicester's the following remarkable passage occurs, relative to Mary, Queen of Scots: "My Lord, there is another report which I understand is come from the (French) Ambassador here, by way of complaint against your Lordship, which I know will much mislike her Majesty; that is, that your Lordship doth of late keep the Scotch Queen there very barely for her diet, insomuch as upon Easter-day last, she had both so few dishes, and such bad meat in them, as it was too bad to see it; and that she finding fault thereat, your Lordship should answer, that you were cut off your allowance, and therefore could yield her no better. Assuredly, my Lord, the Ambassador hath spoken this, and saith he is written to of her, to complain to her Majesty. Your Lordship shall do well to understand if any such cause doth grow from thence, and to advertise with speed, for this is most true, I write to you. And so, my Lord, I must leave you for this time, being greatly troubled against these great Lords' coming, who are now landed, and will be here on Friday next."

ticular account of the several persons named; from which it appears, that by the Prince Dolphin (the usual title of the immediate heir to the crown of France), the Prince of Conti, Francis de Bourbon, was intended.

Great preparations appear to have been made at Court, for the coming of these Commissioners, and her Majesty's goldsmiths were, as it seems, particularly set to work, to supply the following curious articles: "deep bottles gilt with the Queen's arms graven at the bottom; laires, trenchers, chargers, platters, demy-platters, dishes, demy-dishes, saucers, spoons, and setting-sticks of silver, to set ruffs."

But for the Queen's actual reception of the Ambassadors, such whimsical and strange devices were got ready, as scarcely to be read of in these days without a smile; for in truth, her Majesty chose to appear before them, as the author of the Court of Elizabeth has written, "in the borrowed character of a heroine of romance, rather than that of a great Princess, whose vigorous, yet cautious politics, had rendered her for more than twenty years, the admiration of all the Statesmen of Europe." It would take up too much of our time and paper, to attempt minutely to describe this curious pageant, which the peculiar taste of the times only could excuse, and all the particulars of which have been amply related by other writers; but we must not omit to observe, that the famous Sir Philip Sidney did not disdain to act a conspicuous part in this gorgeous spectacle, in which were exhibited all the pastimes of the tilt and tournament, justings and barrier.* In Mr. Nichols's interesting work of the Progresses of Queen Elizabeth, almost every thing relating to this splendid show, has been carefully collected and brought together, from various sources, beginning, of course, with the contemporary writers, who appear to have been not a few. The short account of this extraordinary entertainment, by Bishop Hurd, one of the most modern writers upon the subject, may deserve to be transcribed.

"Nothing shews the romantic disposition of the Queen, and indeed of her times, more evidently than the Triumph, as it was called, devised and performed with great solemnity, in honour of the French Commissioners, in 1581. The contrivance was, for four of her principal Courtiers, under the quaint appellation of 'four foster-children of Desire,' to besiege and carry by dint of arms,

* Sir Philip had before this condescended to compose a Mask, for the entertainment of her Majesty, on her visit to his uncle Leicester, at his new seat of Wanstead House, ann. 1578. It was called, the "Lady of the May," and partook too much, it must be acknowledged, for the credit of so great a man, of the usual over-strained flatteries of the day.

'the Fortress of Beauty;' intending by this courtly ænigma, nothing less than the Queen's Majesty's own person. The actors in this famous triumph, were the Earl of Arundel, the Lord Windsor, Master Philip Sidney, and Master Fulk Grevil, and the whole was conducted so entirely in the spirit and language of knight-errantry, that nothing in the Arcadia itself is more romantic. To see the drift and propriety of this triumph, it is to be observed, that the business which brought the French Commissioners into England, was the great affair of the Queen's marriage with the Duke of Anjou."*

But of all the accounts preserved, of the costly reception of these foreign Ambassadors, scarcely any can exceed that of the splendid dinner given by Lord Burghley himself, at Burghley or Exeter house in the Strand, and still to be seen among the Lansdowne MSS. in the British Museum. The scale of magnitude on which this great feast was conducted, the number of guests and attendants, the abundance of provision, and the whole of the preparations, afford us such an idea of what must have been then the extent and greatness of this mansion, and the style of living of its owner, that it may be taken as the best illustration of both which history has left us.

The account, which occupies three or four sheets of paper, is arranged under different heads, one containing a list of the presents and purchases of food, &c.; another, the ordering and duties of the several servants and attendants in waiting, &c.; a third, the payments to workmen employed in making the necessary arrangements; a fourth contains the various items of expense, with the gross amount of the whole, and other particulars of the entertainment.

In the first paper, entitled "A collection of all the presents, emptions, and store for a dyner of the French Commissioners, Sunday the last of April, 1581, at Burghley House," we have a list of between seventy and eighty different articles of provision, with their value affixed; among which, are "two stags, 40*s.* two bucks, 20*s.* six kids, 24*s.* six pigs, 10*s.* six shins of beef, 24*s.* four gammons of bacon, 16*s.* one swan, 10*s.* three cranes, 20*s.* twenty-four curlews, 24*s.* one rest shank, 10*d.* fifteen pheasants, 30*s.* fifty-four herons, 8*l.* 15*s.* eight partridges, 8*s.*" besides vast quantities of beef, veel, mutton, pork, and other solid substantial feeding. The fish list enumerates, amongst various other kinds, sturgeon, congers, salmon, trouts, lampreys, lobsters, prawns, gurnuds, and oysters. Thirty-six shillings is set down for herbs and sallads; a large sum, considering how far money would then go, and a proof what abundance there must have been of other things; the cream is charged, 27*s.* the quantity of butter used, was 360 pounds; of eggs, 3300; of spices, 42 pounds; and there is a charge of three shillings among the latter items, for three gallons of rose water.

In the paper containing the names and duties of the several servants and officers attendant on the feast, are mentioned sewers, gentlemen-ushers, cupboard keepers, fetchers of bread and wine, keepers of doors, &c.; the particular places of waiting in, and the nature of whose employments, are all minutely specified; the number of these amounted to forty-nine gentlemen, and thirty-four servants.

The "breef of th' expenses," another of the papers, contains a summary of the charges of this great entertainment, among which there is reckoned,—"for the pantry, manchets (a small white loaf), 35*s.* 4*d.*; kitchen-bread, 6*s.*; pantry-baskets, &c. 18*s.*; and trenchers, 10*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*" For the buttery, there was provided as much beer and ale, with additional drinking jugs, as cost 75*l.* 4*d.* the wines for the cellar (which consisted of "Gascon wine, sack, and Ipocras") cost 21*l.* 16*s.*; the provision of beef, mutton, veal, lambs, coneys, is set down at 7*l.* 4*s.*; the kids, poultry, and wild fowl, with the fish, butter, eggs, lard, &c. came to 54*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* exclusively of what had been sent to his Lordship on the occasion as presents, and which are valued at 174*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*; the expense for grocery, is reckoned at 56*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*; the pastry, 7*l.* 6*s.*; "the voydunces" 77*s.* exclusively of which there was expended for the hire of cooks, scullions, &c. 34*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.*; for the hire of additional vessels and glass, 11*l.* 7*s.* 3*d*; in rewards, 10*l.* 15*s*; and for flowers, rushes, &c. 107*s.* and 10*d.*; for turket carpets, 11*l.* "Q. Picture" (a portrait of the Queen, seemingly introduced as the founder of the feast) 15*s.*; joint stools, 105*s.*; pewter cisterns, 6*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*; and pantry knives, &c. 57*s.* And for the works, "to carpenters, plasterers, labourers, sawyers, glaziers, smiths, plummers, naylmen; and for the timber, lead, lathe, board, &c. as appeareth by a particular book thereof, 69*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*" The entire expense of the entertainment, was 649*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.*

Among the rooms, and different places mentioned as stations for the servants and officers, are enumerated "the great chamber, parlour, gallery, entry, ewerie, plate-house, cellary, buttery, pantry, the great kitchen, the two kitchens, and others;" from which we may form some idea of this then lordly residence. Three is also, in a separate book, relative to the household here (and much of which seems to be in the handwriting of Lord Burghley himself), a list of the "armour at Burleigh House, in 1556;" and the quantity of which denotes this to have been then a town mansion of the very first class. The following is a list of some of the most curious articles:

Three pair of demi-lances, two pair of cross-bows, one target, painted; pikes, and long staves, thirteen corslets, some black and some white; six black bills, one forrest bill, one mace of steel, two long bows, of which, it is said, the one was "for his Lordship's own sporting, and the other for his wife's;" three livery bows, a sword, with a scabbard of velvet; one gilt rapier, and one black ditto, with scabbards of velvet; two hangers, with velvet sheaths, one long, the other short, one of which, it is said, in a note, "was my father's." Besides a great number of other arms and weapons. But to return—

It will be concluded as matter of course, we presume, that Lord Burghley was one of the principal persons nominated by the Queen, to treat concerning the marriage with these Commissioners, nor was it long before they came to terms of agreement.

As the marriage never took place, it is scarcely necessary to crowd our pages with the articles agreed upon; they may be seen in Camden, Rapin, Hume, and other authors; and the only wonder is, that Elizabeth could possibly suffer the Commissioners, on either side, to proceed so far, if she had not entertained, at times at least, some serious inclination towards the marriage. But we shall never be able to know how she sustained the conflict that seems to have been excited in her mind, between "inclination and reason, love and ambition;" but every thing conspires to prove that however strange, considering the great disparity of years, there must have been such a struggle in this particular instance.* At the same time, in some measure to save the credit of Elizabeth from the imputation of being actuated solely by vanity, or betrayed by weakness, into the encouragement she seemed to give to the Duke, as well as to vindicate, in some degree, her honour, in the abrupt conclusion of the intercourse, there can be little doubt but that the case was one of extreme perplexity, from the differences among her Counsellors and Courtiers, the state of the kingdom, and, indeed, of Europe at large. It was, probably, the last chance of continuing the succession in her own line: it might lead to important alliances, and conciliate some foreign foes, at the time that Spain was making every effort to become paramount: it might interrupt another projected marriage of Monsieur with a Princess of Spain.* On the other hand, she had all the dangers, mortifications, and disappointments to apprehend, which, with much force of reasoning, and a boldness bespeaking the utmost honesty and sincerity, had been so recently set before her, in the celebrated letter of Sir Philip Sidney.

* Simier has the credit of having turned the Queen's thoughts aside from such topics as might awaken her ambition, to the prejudice of his master; and disposing her to listen rather to tales of gallantry, and such conversation as might engage her affections, and incline her to favour the Duke's addresses.—Hume.

Certain, however, it is, that in the course of the year 1581, of which we are writing, things were suffered to be carried very far, though not to any certain conclusion; for, besides the settlement of the articles of marriage by the Commissioners on both parts, money was sent to the Duke in Flanders, who had been chosen by the States Governor of the Netherlands; and so persuaded was that Prince himself, that every thing was in a fair train to the accomplishment of his wishes, that he put his army there into winter-quarters; and in the month of November passed over to England, where he met with such a reception as "gave him," says Hume, "certain hopes that Elizabeth had surmounted all scruples, and was finally determined to make choice of him for a husband."

In all these negotiations, the power of Spain seemed to be the great object in the views of England. All that Monsieur was doing in Flanders, evidently tended to check that power in those parts, especially if supported by his brother, the King of France; but as this seemed to involve in it a quarrel with Spain, and a general war, both Courts seemed extremely wary and cautious in all their proceedings. Henry was ready enough to conclude a league against Spain, if the marriage were to take place, but not otherwise. Elizabeth, in the mean

* In July of this year, Walsingham was sent to France to negotiate and conclude a league, offensive and defensive, with Henry, against the increasing power and dangerous usurpations of Spain: in the course of which negotiations, nothing appears to have been more embarrassing to him, or to the cause in hand, than the uncertainty in which the Queen allowed him to be kept with regard to the marriage. See his letters to Lord Burghley from Paris, in Digges, 1581. Lord Burghley himself, indeed, from the letter he wrote to Walsingham (Digges, 371), appears to have been quite as much perplexed, as to the Queen's real determination. He supported Walsingham, however, all he could, protesting, that whatever suspicions might be raised against him, he should have done exactly the same in his situation.—Digges, 374. In one of his letters to Walsingham (from Greenwich, Aug. 13, 1581), he acknowledges the difficulty of his situation. "In this sort I am commanded to write unto you, but in what sort you shall deal to remedy this inconvenience, neither by her Majesty can I direct you, nor of myself can I inform you." He ends one of his letters in these words: "To conclude, I find her Majesty, in words, more inclined to the marriage than at your departure; but how long this inclination will continue, I know not."

while, laboured to shew the necessity of a league between France and England, at all events, and whether the marriage took place or not, in order to keep the Spanish Monarch within bounds; but she seems to have been dreadfully afraid of the expenses into which she might be drawn, and this to so great a degree, that Walsingham was obliged to remonstrate with her very earnestly, beseeching her, for the love of God, to look into her own estate, and see what charges the crown might bear; and if, by reasonable advances, she could avert the united attacks and malice of France, Spain, and Scotland, not to "prefer treasure before safety." The extreme difficulty of the negotiation entrusted to Sir Francis Walsingham, under these circumstances, may be judged of by his letters, in Digges, commonly addressed to Lord Burghley, and in which he appears to have been oftentimes quite at a loss how to act:* for, in addition to other perplexities, Philip, at this time, was actually extending his dominions, by seizing upon Portugal, to which, it must be admitted, he had a very plausible claim, though, to all appearance, exceedingly against the will of the people, who, according to a paper put into the hands of Lord Burghley, "had rather," it seems, "have been subject to a Mora† King than to a Spaniard."

On the death of Sebastian, King of Portugal, who lost his life in Africa, in the year 1578, and who was the great grandson of Emanuel, "surnommé Le Grand,"‡ the crown reverted to Prince Henry, one of the sons of the latter, a Cardinal of Rome, who, under a dispensation from the Pope, ascended the throne, and held it two years, dying in 1580.§ Upon the demise of King Henry, Don Antonio, the son of an elder brother of the late King, Louis Duc de

* One of his letters to Lord Burghley begins thus: "My very good Lord, I have received your letter of the 17th, sent by Mr. Vice-Chamberlain's man. Sorry I am to see her Majesty so apt to take offence against me, which falleth not out contrary to my expectation; and, therefore, I did protest unto her, after it had pleased her to make choice of me, to employ me this way, that I should repute it a greater favour to be committed to the Tower, unless her Majesty may grow more certain in her resolutions there. Instead of amity, I fear her Highness shall receive enmity, and we, her Ministers here, be greatly discomforted, having no certain direction what to follow."

§ See in Lodge's Illustrations, vol. ii. No. cxxix. a curious paper indorsed by Lord Burghley, purporting to be "a proof how the Cardinal Henry is rightful King of Portugal, by the death of King Sebastian." I find in this account two mistakes; in the note, p. 193, Philip II. is said to have taken the crown in right of his wife, Isabella, daughter of Emanuel. It should be his mother. 2dly, in the paper itself, Don Antonio is said to have perished in Africa, p. 194.

Beja, was proclaimed King, but the legitimacy of his birth being disputed, Philip II. claimed the crown, as son of Elizabeth,* the eldest daughter of King Emanuel, wife to Charles V.; and though Antonio had been formally crowned, Philip soon found means to drive him from the throne, compelling him thereby to throw himself upon the protection of England and France. In the course of this year he was in England, strongly soliciting assistance, and which in part he received, by the fitting out of a fleet, under the command of Drake and Hawkins, to proceed to Terceira, for the security of the Azores, where his right to the crown was still acknowledged; but the Queen was backward to commit herself too far, while she was uncertain of the co-operation of France, so that, as it appears from Lord Burghley's correspondence with Walsingham, the fleet was for some time subject to orders and counter-orders, exceedingly distressing.† In truth she had been asked to assist Don Antonio, both by the King of France and the Queen Mother; but the latter having herself some claim to the crown of Portugal, would not allow Don Antonio to be called King,‡ thereby rendering the assistance he might expect from France very doubtful. In one of Lord Burghley's letters, the Queen is stated to have suggested two very good reasons why she should not be expected by the Court of France to be at any very great charges, either for the support of the Duc d'Anjou in Flanders, or of Don Antonio, in his attempts to recover the crown of Portugal. We shall give them in Lord Burghley's own words, at the conclusion of his letter from Greenwich, August 24, 1581.

"After her Majesty had read hitherto, she willed me to reiterate more largely, two reasons to you, why her aids ought not to be such, as percase will be demanded; the one, that she hath no party-interest in Monsieur's actions, as France shall have. The other, for that the Queen Mother hath an interest for Portugal, and not her Majesty."

In truth, Monsieur was securing to himself a Government, which had been proffered, indeed, to Elizabeth, but refused. France, therefore, had comparatively, a much more direct, if not a much greater interest, in his success there; and of the Queen Mother's connexion with Portugal, we have spoken. Of Lord Burghley's judgment upon both these points, a good account may be found in two papers printed by Strype; the one entitled, "A note of such things as were agreed on at a conference holden at Paris, and other things propounded and not agreed on, Aug. 23, 1581, between the commissioners of the Queen of England and the French King, with the Lord Treasurer's judgment thereof," Annals, vol. iii. part i. 18, 19; the second, which may be seen in the Appendix to the same volume, No. xi. purporting to be, "The judgment of Lord Burghley, the Lord Treasurer, upon a consultation of the Queen and Council, concerning a fleet to be sent to the Azores Islands, under Sir Francis Drake, to assist Don Antonio, expulsed his kingdom of Portugal, by Philip, King of Spain; digested under certain questions, with answers to each."

* It may be observed that this Princess is as often called Isabella as Elizabeth. In fact, in French, the names are identical. Don Antonio would have insisted upon it, that his father, Don Lewis, had been secretly married to his mother, whose name appears to have been Yolanda de Gomez.—See Dict. Historique, art. Antoine VIII.

As to domestic concerns this year, we must refer to Strype for many particulars, in which the Lord Treasurer had his share as usual, being the general referee in the disputes and altercations between the Puritans and the more orthodox Clergy, especially the Bishops,* who had indeed a hard task upon their hands, their authority being disputed, and their discipline set at nought.† Two sects, in particular, seem to have given them great trouble this year; namely, the Family of Love, and the Brownists; of the former, the Convocation took notice, but to no great effect; and as to the latter, the Lord Treasurer was particularly appealed to, by those who favoured Brown, as well as by others, to put some check upon him, if possible, as a man of commendable zeal, and good character,* if he might but be turned into the right way by that Lord's interference. Brown was in some degree related to Lord Burghley, as we learn from the letters of the latter in the Biographia Britannica; letters that bespeak a kind and anxious desire to have him restored to a right sense of religion by lenient measures.† He became, however, the head or leader of those who, in England and Holland, were afterwards distinguished by the name of Independents; Brown himself had had a University education, and in fact, he did not long continue at the head of the very party who took their denomination from him,‡ but after having preached and written much against the establishment at home and abroad, conformed or pretended to do so, and accepted the living of Achurch, in the county of Northampton; not thereby, however, redeeming his character, for he is said to have neglected both his church and his wife, and to have died in prison.

* Lord Burghley lost this year one of his oldest acquaintance, and a fellow-labourer in the cause of the Reformation from the days of King Henry, Bishop Cox, tutor to King Edward VI., and of whom we have already had much to say in the course of this work. Strype, in his Annals, has given a good account of him, and very properly introduced Leland's verses, addressed to Mr. Legh, who had asked him, to point out to him, if he could, any person in the world (that then so generally abounded with wicked and false men), that might be in all respects said to be endued with faithfulness and integrity; Leland, in a very elegant copy of Latin verses, named Cox. His fame, however, would have shone more purely had he known how to conduct himself with a better temper than upon some occasions was the case; but he was a good deal harassed towards the latter part of his life, which was prolonged to the advanced age of eighty-two. Lord Burghley was remembered in his will, in the bequest of a valuable ring.

† Norwich seems to have been a very troublesome diocese at all times. The Bishop, this year, made great complaints against the magistrates, who defended themselves in a memorial addressed to the Lord Treasurer; and to be seen in the Appendix to the third volume of the Annals, No. iii.

The Papists, Jesuits, and seminaries were busy this year, with Campian at their head, whose history is certainly remarkable, and who may be said to have died a martyr§ to the cause he had undertaken, of recovering England to the profession of the Catholic faith. That this was the object of his mission, there can be no doubt, since he openly avowed it, in his memorable letter to the Privy Council, to be seen in Strype's Annals, iii. Appendix, No. vi. in which, speaking for his society, as well as himself, he says, "As touching our society, be it known to you, that we have made a league, all the Jesuits in the world, whose succession and multitude, must overreach all the practices of England, cheerfully to carry the cross that you shall lay upon us, and never to despair your recovery while we have a man left to enjoy your Tyburn, or to be racked with your torments, or to be consumed with your poisons. Expenses are reckoned; the

* So it was asserted by some persons of eminence who wrote to Lord Burghley about him; others represent him to have been of a violent spirit, and of a character rather doubtful.—See Adam's View of Religions, art. Brownists. Lord Burghley seems to have been misled as to the character of this fanatic.

† There is a lenity in the Lord Treasurer's conduct towards his relation, which reflects honour on that excellent Statesman.—Kippis's additions to the Biographia Britannica.

‡ The Brownists did not object to the doctrines, but to the discipline of the Church, and equally condemned Episcopacy and Presbytery, as to the jurisdiction of consistories, classes, and synods. See a long account of their tenets in the Biographia Britannica, art. Brown (Robert). Their sect has been compared with that of the Donatists of old. Brown was certainly of a good family; his grandfather had leave to be covered in the King's presence—a grant from Henry VIII.

§ The Jesuit, Paul Bambino, at the end of a book he wrote upon the subject, concludes, "Deo Laus, B. Q. V. M. M. et beatissimo nostrorum Martyrum Anglorum principi Edmundo Campiano."

enterprise is begun; it is of God; it cannot be withstood: so the faith was planted; so it must be restored.

"If these my offers be refused, and my endeavours can take no place, and I, having run thousands of miles to do you good, shall be rewarded with rigour, I have no more to say, but to recommend your case and mine to Almighty God, the searcher of hearts, who send us of his grace, and set us at accord, before the day of payment; to the end at last we may be friends in heaven, where all injuries shall be forgotten."

It is impossible not to admire the spirit with which he thus avowed his object, and the benevolent prayer with which he concludes his letter; but it is not so much to the mere object of his mission we must look, or to the benevolence of his expressions, as to the means likely to have been resorted to, for the recovery of England, if the obstacles to his attempt should have been found greater than he expected; he speaks of his offers and his endeavours to do good in the kingdom; his offers were to dispute before the chief Doctors and Masters of both Universities, and therein "to avow the faith of the Catholic Church by proof invincible,—Scriptures, Councils, Fathers, histories, and reason;" and by "the common wisdom of law, before the lawyers spiritual and temporal." This was fair and open, nor was it declined; many conferences and disputations being allowed to take place in the Tower; but, in regard to which, as generally happens, the victory has been claimed on both sides;* and it would require volumes to qualify the reader to be a judge now between the parties, farther than to observe, that the two Professions of Faith, being still opposed to each other, Protestantism stands its ground, as not beaten by any references to the Scriptures, Councils, Fathers, histories, reason, or law; but, adhuc sub judice lis est, and the Papists must be allowed to tell their own story as well as the Protestants. As to Campian's endeavours to do good in the kingdom, we may say of them as we have said of his offers; if he expected to recover the nation by reasoning and persuasion, to its obedience to the Holy See, we are ready to grant, that, as a zealous Romanist, he had a right to believe and assert that he had the good of the kingdom at heart; it was consistent with his principles to think so; but still the question remains, how were the resisting obstacles to be removed, if persuasion should fail? And here it is impossible not to look to the means contemplated by the head of the Romish Church, the acknowledged commander of the whole host of Jesuits. It is impossible not to ask ourselves, whether Elizabeth and her chief Counsellors were not regarded by the Jesuits as obstacles to the "recovery of England," which were to be removed, if it could be done. We might perhaps be permitted to appeal to the discoveries of Anthony Monday, sometime of the English College at Rome, of which an account is to be seen in Strype's Annals, under the year 1580; but though this evidence is very remarkable as regards the removal of such obstacles as we are alluding to, we would rather appeal to such testimonies as tend to corroborate Monday's Confessions, rendering the truth of them so probable, as scarcely to leave a doubt behind. We would appeal not only to the Bull of Pope Pius V., once Inquisitor-general, but to the letters of that Pontiff, lately translated and published by M. de Potter,* from which it is easy to collect, not only how zealous that great personage was to recover all the Protestant or revolted states of Europe, but what were the means he would have employed to overcome all outward obstacles to such a measure. Any person conversant with the history of the Netherlands, under Philip II., must know what Pius meant, when he wrote to the Duke of Alva to persevere in the course he had taken, and had been then for some time pursuing, "pour retablir la religion Catholique," in the provinces committed to his charge, "en son premiere etat." "Cette gloire," says the Pontiff, in M. de Potter's translation, "surpassera celle de tous les généraux et de tous les Empereurs." But, indeed, the English heretics are particularly mentioned in one of his letters to the same sad destroyer, as those against whom he was to direct his attacks, and against the usurper Elizabeth, above all; "et contra illam quæ se pro Angliæ Regina gerit," are his own original words. Elizabeth's heretical contemporaries, as might be expected, fared no better, as the Prince of Orange, nefarius ille Aurangia Princeps, Pius calls him; the Admiral Coligni, "perditionis filius;" the Prince of Condé, &c.†

* See Strype's Annals, iii. p. 48, and his Life of Aylmer, ch. iii. The Bishop foresaw what the consequences would be, either of public or private disputations, and would have prevented them if he could.

* Lettres de St. Pie V., sur les affaires religieuses de son temps en France, par de Potter, Bruxelles, 1827. The letters are in number xxxix., addressed to Philip II., Charles IX., Catherine de Medicis, the Duc d'Alva; Gonzago, Prince of Mantua; Priuli, Doge of Venice; Emanuel Philip, Duke of Savoy; the Cardinal de Bourbon; the Cardinals d'Armagnac and Lorraine; the Duc d'Anjou, afterwards Henry III.; the Marquis de Villiers, and Cosmo Duke of Florence.

† We must presume that every body knows the story of the death of this great man; a more heartless, cowardly murder, perhaps was never committed; and yet, in these letters of Pius, God is thanked for having so put an end to le chef des armées des heretiques.

We have no wish to do more than refer to such proofs as the above, of the spirit which animated the Court of Rome in the times of which we are writing, in order to account for the severities practised against its friends, emissaries, and advocates, though sometimes rather upon presumptive, than any actual and positive evidences of guilt. Surely it was enough to know that " the word was gone out" from that awful tribunal for the extirpation of heretics, without pity or reserve,* to justify the suspicions with which the Papists at this time were viewed by the Queen's Council, especially any of the company of Jesus, the disciples of Loyola, whose perfect subserviency to the Pontiff rendered it quite reasonable to measure their actions or designs by the standard or pattern exhibited at Rome. Had Campian come into England from Rome, in the time of Pius V, " pour retablir la religion Catholique, en son premier etat," he could not possibly have supposed that he had anything less to do than to overthrow the rule and government of the heretical usurper Elizabeth, if he could in any way succeed; and though Pius himself was dead, when he did come, his Bull was not to be regarded as a dead letter, but held to continue as much in operation, if opportunities served, as ever, by the Pope's own acknowledgment.†

However much, therefore, we may be disposed to feel for individuals who suffered at this time, in the cause of Papistry, especially upon presumptive proofs, it is to the Pope of Rome‡ we should turn for the solution of all doubts and difficulties, as was alleged by the leading counsel (Anderson) in the prosecu-

* The letters of Pius to Charles IX., urges upon him " l'extermination entière des heretiques, j'usqua à ce qu'ils soient tous massacrés." This was but just before the slaughter of St. Bartholomew.

† " This is certain and undoubted," says the continuator of Hollinshed, " that there was found a faculty about Campian a little before his death, wherein authority was given from the Bishop of Rome, Gregory XIII., to execute the sentence of the Bull by Pope Pius Quintus, against all the Queen's Majesty's subjects as heretics." p. 460.

‡ The Papists are supposed to have taken courage from the projected marriage of the Queen with Monsieur; but exactly in the same degree that they derived encouragement from this expected union, the Protestants, who were adverse to the match, took the alarm, and importuned the Queen to let the law more freely take its course against suspected Papists, to quiet all alarms of a change in religion, and the toleration of Popery.—See Camden, 270, 271; and the Life of Elizabeth (after Rapin), vol. ii. 39, 40. It may be seen, from the latter reference, how very inexplicable the conduct of Elizabeth was at this time, and how much it may be expected to exceed the power of any subsequent historian, to unravel the mysteries of her conduct. Rapin has attempted to do it; but we are not prepared to say he has done it so successfully as we could wish.

tion of Campian. "If you ask," said he, "from whence these treasons and seditious conspiracies had their first offspring, I ask from whence they could have it but from the well itself, the Pope." This is exceedingly true; the threats of the Pope were the leading causes of all the sufferings of the Papists in this kingdom; even, we would say, of the unhappy Mary. The Pope was the great enemy of them all; his authority was diminishing, but not yet extinct; and the more it was invaded and pressed upon, the more vigorously it appears to have been called into action.* There was no design against England and against Elizabeth to which he was not privy, which indeed he was not known openly to sanction and encourage, as the speech to which we have just referred sets forth. "Shall we deny either Campian or his companions, without the Pope's assent or consent, to have conspired these matters beyond the seas themselves? Why? Had they no encouragement at his hands? Did he bestow nothing upon them for their maintenance? Was there no cause which either he should do for them, or they for him; they Papists, he Pope? they flying their country, he receiving them; they Jesuits, he their founder; he supreme head, they sworn members; he their chief provost, they his dearest subjects; how can it be but he was privy—privy! nay, the author and setter on? He has been always like himself, and never liker in ought than this; he knew well enough no foreign hostility was convenient; the Spaniard would be discovered; the Frenchman would be suspected; the Roman not beloved. How then? Forsooth, men born and bred in our own nation, perfect in our own tongue and language, instructed in our own Universities—they, and they only, must endeavour our overthrow. In what order? They must come secretly into the realm—they must change their habit and names†—they must dissemble their vocations—they must wander unknown—to what end? To dissuade the people

* Those who entered the English College at Rome, were expected to submit themselves to the following regulations, as the Catholic Priest at Rome told Monday: "Such as come to this holy place, must faithfully lend his life and conversation to honour and reverence our provident and Holy Father the Pope, in all things that shall like him to command; to hold and confess him the Universal Head of Christ's Church; and embrace his decrees as the holy ordinance and will of God, for he is the person of God on earth; and he cannot err, because the Spirit of Divine Grace guideth him continually. He hath authority over all Kings and Princes, to erect and suppress whom he pleaseth." If this were not in conformity with the public acts and edicts of the Vatican at the same period, we should not cite it.

† Campian assumed the name of Hastings.—Cobbett's State Trials. See also ib., as to his change of dresses.

from their allegiance to their Prince—to reconcile them to the Pope—to plant the Romish religion—to supplant both Prince and province."*

The whole speech is very good, as it may be seen in the State Trials, and is said to have had great effect on Campian and the other persons arraigned; but we do not wish to insist upon it further than to shew, that under all possible disguises, and in the face of the strongest denials of any evil purposes, the Pope contemplated nothing less as the fruit of the Jesuits' labour, than the extermination of all heretics, and the overthrow of Elizabeth and her Counsellors, as the chief abettors of them.†

* It is surely reasonable, when speaking of the time during which England was loaded with reproaches for its severities against foreigners, to inquire how Englishmen fared abroad. We shall copy, therefore, the following passage which occurs in a letter from Mr. Fount, Walsingham's Secretary, to Mr. A. Bacon, both of them being on the Continent at the time, viz. March 1581-2. "The handling of our nation in Italy is daily worse and worse, for it is advertised my Lord Ambassador, that the Inquisition is newly established in the state of Venice, and through all Italy, against strangers, especially our nation. It is expected that all the gentlemen in Venice and Padua are prisoners; that the great Prior, an English fugitive there, and many other Catholics at Rome, are clapt up, and generally all other English, if the least suspicion can be gathered that they have other than Papists to their friends in England. For Lister and others in the Inquisition at Rome, it will go very hard; but on Egleby and Dutton there is like to be execution done, if already it be not." The same letter adds, that all passages were stopt, that the Englishmen might not escape, and that all their letters were intercepted. In another letter, April 15th, 1582, the same writer observes, "It is written hither of great credit from a gentleman of Florence, a great personage there, and well affected to our nation, that through our fugitives means, there is great rigour like to be used to any of our country that shall be found in these parts, being true subjects to her Majesty."—Birch, i. 21, 23.

† Camden has been accused of taking his account entirely from the declamatory harangues of the Counsel employed against the prisoners, disregarding the positive denial of all guilt on the part of the latter. But the great question is, were these harangues declamatory as far as regarded the designs of the Pope, and the instructions given to his agents, which might be as secret as possible, and not capable of detection till carried into execution, which it was certainly the duty of the Queen's ministers to prevent. Campian had expressly addressed the scholars of both Universities, in a book, in which he was not content to state his own reasons, for returning to the Romish Church, but in which he strongly exhorted them to follow his example, and greatly calumniating the Reformation, and those who had contributed to it. This so disturbed the Lord Treasurer, as well it might, that he would have had Bishop Aylmer answer the book, as one more particularly competent to do it, having been, as well as himself, personally acquainted with many of the first Reformers. What passed upon this occasion may be seen in the third chapter of Strype's Life of that Bishop. The Book, when it could be found (for though dispersed abroad, it was very secretly kept by those who had it), was answered, not in the way proposed by Bishop Aylmer, Campian on his trial defended his cause ably, but certainly not to the removal of the imputations cast upon him, as a direct agent of the Pope, for such purposes as have been before insisted upon; namely, the extirpation of heresy in England * by almost any means. It would have been better indeed that they should have been convicted upon some more decided overt acts of treason, than upon mere suspicion or rumours, though it might have been extremely dangerous to have waited for such acts.—Still, evil designs checked or frustrated, must be liable to be discredited, and we cannot wonder, therefore, that some of the persons punished at this time should be judged by their own party to have suffered undeservedly, as most of the proofs brought against them were, we must confess, merely presumptive, and perhaps retrospective.†

but by Whitaker, the Professor of Divinity in Cambridge.—The Bishop held it in great contempt, as artful and arrogant, comparing it with the "vanities of a Porphyrius or a Julian, who were base apostates from Christianity." Whitaker was answered by the Jesuit Duræus.—Paris, 1582.

* The extirpation of heresy, that is Protestantism, must have been included in the design to restore Popery in the kingdom; and whether the extermination of heretics was not included in the design to exterminate heresy, in those days, we would leave to be determined by undoubted facts, and the proceedings at Rome on occasion of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The continuator of Holinshed, refers his readers to two writings in vindication of the proceedings against Campian and the other Jesuits.—One of these, viz. the Execution of Justice in England, is well known to have been attributed to Lord Burghley, but it received a reply from Cardinal Allen, extracts from which may be seen in Dr. Lingard's History of England, vol. v. note (v.) p. 654.; in which the Cardinal will be found to have taken an odd part in his defence of Christian Catholics, if he really intended to screen them from the reproach of admitting the Pope's power of deposing Princes, and absolving subjects from their allegiance, for to shew that it was an admitted fact that subjects might rise against their Prince, in defence of their religion, he cites the authority of Calvin, Beza, Zuingle, Goodman, Knox, Luther, the Magdeburgh Divines, the Reformers in Scotland, in France, and Flanders, and Elizabeth herself, as aiding such with money and troops, but the fact being so, it was far better, he concluded, that the Pope rather than the people should have the direction of such movements. According to which maxim, of course, there could be no movements against the Romish Religion, or Catholic Princes, but against reputed heretics, every resistance the Pope might choose to sanction, for some Popery was to be found in all countries; but England was proscribed as the head quarters of heresy.

† Dr. Lingard, in his History of England, says, "the report of their trials must convince every reasonable man of their innocence." This is certainly a very great reflection on the Court and Jury before whom they were tried, but it does not follow, that every thing was brought before the Court, that might have been alleged against them. The continuator of Holinshed writes as follows upon the subject.—"A number of matters more were brought against them (Campian and other Jesuits), which to rehearse would require a far more large discourse: but to be brief; in the end, this was the full and certain issue, that these men, when they were beyond the seas, the

As to the Universities this year, Strype records some curious instances of the interposition of Lord Burghley, "the compassionate Chancellor" of Cambridge, as he styles him, in behalf of certain members, who appear to have been hardly dealt with; the cases may be seen in the third volume of the Annals, b. i. ch. v. as also of some controversies between the University and the townsmen of Oxford, which the Lord Treasurer was asked to adjust, and which the same writer tells us, were by the favourable countenance and determination of that noble Lord, timely and most satisfactorily composed, and for which he received a letter of thanks, some passages of which it would be wrong not to transcribe. It is headed, Academiæ Oxoniensis ad D. Burghleum Epistola gratulatoria; and begins, "Quam sit beata et felix Respub. literaria (illustriss. Domine), quod te virum prudentia ornatum singulari, et summa præditum authoritate, nacta sit patronum et defensorem; testis est, non illa modo Cantabrigiensis Academia, quæ in tuo patrocinio et tutela feliciter acquiescit; sed et Oxoniensis nostra, quæ nuper e turbulenta tempestate, prospero bonitatis tuæ flatu cursum accelerante, in tranquillitatis portum devecta est."—And after mention of the particular benefits conferred on them it proceeds; "Gratias habemus honori tuo et humillimas, et plurimas, et maximas, quod nobis studiisque nostris tam honorifice prospexeris: sanctissimeque pollicemur, nunquam nos ne Cantabrigiensibus quidem tuis, in te colendo, honorando, suspiciendo, et omni officii genere tibi satisfaciendo ulla re, ullo tempore concessuros."—And it concludes with the following prayer, expressive of the great importance of his public services in general; "Deus Opt. Max.—ab omni periculo incolumem te conservet, novisque indies honoribus cumulet, ut tuo consilio et auxilio non solum academiæ magis magisque floreant; sed politia etiam hujus regni, et Ecclesia Dei novis quotidie felicitatis accessionibus augeantur. general agreement and determination amongst them was, to work the death of our most gracious Princess, to destroy her dominion and to erect such as pleased them, when this aforesaid day should take effect, and that their coming over, was to seduce her loving subjects, to win their obedient hearts from her, so that they should be in a readiness to join with a foreign power, and so they should likewise be destroyers of their Princess and country, and that in the mean while they themselves sought to accomplish her Majesty's death, so much as in them lay. This was manifestly proved by very large and ample evidence, creditable witnesses, and their own confessions and writings."

Without meaning to detract unnecessarily from the credit of Leicester upon this occasion, we may surely be allowed to remark, that considering how high in the Council their own Chancellor stood, it is singular that the Chancellor of Cambridge should have been called upon to settle such differences; possibly, however, the Chancellor of Oxford might have been regarded as a party concerned.

In the Appendix to the third volume of Strype's Annals, may be seen also two letters from the celebrated Reformer, Theodore Beza, to Lord Burghley, on presenting to him an ancient copy of the Pentateuch, in six different languages, which he sent to be placed in the library, then about to be erected, under his Lordship's care and directions, in the University over which he presided. This is the famous Hexaglott, still to be seen in the place for which it was designed.

It was on the first of November, 1581, that the Duc d'Anjou, with some Nobles of France, arrived in London, "being very honourably received there, and retained at the Court, with banqueting, shows, and pastimes," of all descriptions, for many weeks. "All the time of his being here," says the famous Robert Cary, Earl of Monmouth, in his Memoirs,* "God so blessed me with means and abilities, as I was ever one in every action that our court triumphs then produced: and they were such as the best wits and inventions in those days could devise, to make the court glorious, and to entertain so great a guest. The Duke's stay here was from Michaelmas to Christmas; then he went from thence to Flushing, and from thence to Antwerp, where he was created, by the States, Duke of Brabant, with great solemnity."

Of his departure from England we shall have to speak under the year ensuing; of what passed while he was here, the above account of the Lord Monmouth may give the reader a pretty general idea; and as for particulars, there is great reason to think some stories have been invented, to the disparagement of Elizabeth, which it may now be quite impossible to clear up; and of which, therefore, we should wish to say as little as possible. As not, indeed, belonging to the history we have in hand; for, though Lord Burghley was undoubtedly much concerned in all the formal and apparently serious negotiations relative to the marriage, he is known almost proverbially to have abstracted himself from all the fooleries and gallantries of the Court. We are quite disposed, therefore, to pass by the famous story of the ring, and the horribly gross accusations of the Countess of Shrewsbury, as communicated to Elizabeth by the Queen of Scots, in a letter, perhaps the most extraordinary that ever was written; and which, we should be inclined to say, no woman of delicate or refined feelings could have been induced to write, under any provocation. Had the charges been ever so well founded, they might have been communicated to Elizabeth in terms less gross and offensive. The story of the ring we are disposed to question from the date of it. If the Duke had really been so offended with Elizabeth, as Camden represents, in the month of November, when the transaction is said to have taken place, he could scarcely have been persuaded to remain so long afterwards with the Queen, and part from her at last upon such good terms; and as for Lady Shrewsbury's accusations, it might reasonably be questioned how she could have been made privy to all the scenes described and reported, relating to many different persons, and happening at different times, and she herself rather proscribed the Court, than confidentially admitted into any of its secrets.

All this, however, as we said before, we are willing to leave to the decision of others. We believe that Elizabeth was weak enough to be captivated by the attentions of her young suitor, and the flatteries of Simier. We believe that policy was oftentimes less in her thoughts upon this occasion than any other, though we fully believe, at the same time, that policy got the better of her inclinations, at least for a time; for the premature death of the Duke, perhaps, in 1584, was the first and last event, which may be said to have entirely terminated the conflict in the breast of Elizabeth. It seems to be quite certain that, in the course of proceedings, she liked the Duke, and would, probably, have married him, had she consulted her inclinations only, or could have forgotten that she was Queen of England.

It is probable that Lord Burghley suffered much this year, from the extravagancies and very perverse conduct of his son-in-law the Earl of Oxford, who had acted very unfeelingly towards his Countess, and greatly involved his affairs, so as to be obliged to sell many of his estates. An account of these things is to be seen in Strype, under the year 1581, who has inserted a very interesting letter from Lady Oxford to her husband, written from her father's house, Dec. 7, 1581. We shall have more to say of this hereafter. Another daughter of his Lordship's was married this year,* to William, eldest son of Thomas Lord Wentworth, the last English Governor of Calais; this marriage also, was so far unfortunate, that, with much better prospects of happiness, from the character and disposition of Mr. Wentworth, than was the case with her sister, he died within the year. Many good offers had been made to Lord Burghley for the marriage of this daughter (Elizabeth), even during her childhood, as among others, from the Lords Buckhurst and Essex,* for their eldest sons, accompanied with large and splendid proposals, in the way of settlements and jointures, but without effect. Mr. Wentworth was probably the object of her own choice, and their marriage seemed to promise much happiness. The ceremony was performed at Theobalds, with great pomp and much festivity, which continued for three days. In the State Paper Office are many letters relating to this marriage, particularly from Lord Wentworth to Lord Burghley, expressing his great satisfaction at finding that his son, Mr. Wentworth's suit, should have been so well entertained; scarcely knowing how sufficiently to express his joy. In one letter his Lordship informs Lord Burghley of a conversation he had just had with Leicester, whom he had made acquainted with the projected marriage of his son, but begged him not yet to tell the Queen of it, and that Leicester, "laying his hand upon his breast, had faithfully promised, that the Queen should not know it nor be made privy to it by him." How soon the Queen was made acquainted with it, we know not, but in the same collection of letters (most obligingly put aside for my particular inspection by Mr. Lemon) there is one from Lord Burghley himself to Sir Francis Walsingham, in which he writes largely of the Queen's approval of the match; and remarks, that the kind speeches of her Majesty to Mr. Wentworth, relative to himself, Lady Burghley, and his daughter, outweighed all that he could give the latter as a portion.—The letter ends, "Make the best of this hasty writing, which is from my bed,—Yours assuredly, W. BURGHLEY."

There seems this year to have been a sad influx of lawless people into the metropolis and its neighbourhood from distant counties, of which Lord Burghley had an account forwarded to him by Fleetwood, Recorder, in a letter printed by Mr. Ellis, and beginning, "My singular good Lord, upon Thursday at even her Majesty in her coach, near Islington, taking of the air, her Highness was environed with a number of rogues, &c." The account is very curious, being only one of the weekly statements made to the Lord Treasurer, of the proceedings of the Police. Great activity appears to have been used upon the above occasion; the report states, that of those taken into custody, only twelve were found belonging to London, Westminster, Southwark, Middlesex, and Surrey; the residue, which appears to have amounted to a very great number, was said to be for the most part, from Wales, Salop, Cheshire, Somersetshire, Bucks, Oxford, and Essex. What he calls rogues, appear to have been lusty beggars, of whom the Savoy was bound to receive, the claudicantes, egrotantes, et peregrinantes, as into an hospital; the prisons were to receive the rest.—An abundance of them were discovered and committed.*

* Ellis's Original Letters, 1st series, vol. iii. p. 283. Many other reports made to Lord Burghley of a similar nature may be found in Mr. Ellis's very interesting volumes; where an account is also given of the Reporter, Sergeant Fleetwood or Fletewood. In one of these letters he notices the detection of a regular school for pickpockets. All the letters are curious, especially as accompanied with Mr. Ellis's short illustrations from history.

It would be more agreeable to ourselves, as well as to our readers, if we could proceed in our history without any reference to the affairs in Scotland, where things continued in a horrible state of confusion, and would probably have been little less so, had England had no concern in what was passing there; the feuds and animosities subsisting between the great families, had taken too deep a root to be easily tranquillized. The murder of two Regents in so short a space of time, the premature death of a third, and the tyranny of a fourth, had kept things there in such a state of distraction and agitation, as to baffle all attempts to effectuate a perfect reconciliation of the parties; and which seemed, therefore, to terminate only in more inveterate, though more smothered, enmities. In the meanwhile, England had a great stake there, and could not be expected to look on with indifference or unconcern; but if we reflect upon the grand object of her policy, we shall find it to be constantly the same; namely, to prevent Scotland becoming such a tool in the hands of foreign powers, as to be made the very instrument of the ruin and overthrow of England; to preserve, if possible, the Protestant Churches of both countries; and to keep the two parts of the British Isle united, by favouring the Protestant or King's party. These were the objects of the English Government, and in themselves they were good; better, we may depend upon it, with regard to both countries, than the objects in contemplation on the part of those who were constantly seeking means to divide the two kingdoms, and, by dividing, compass the ruin, or destroy the independence of both. Of the individuals who bore the most conspicuous parts in these struggles, we can only observe, that it is melancholy to read the charges brought against them, and still more melancholy to have nothing to set against those charges in general, except the common remark, that the spirit of the times was bad; so bad, that the best of men could not take a part in public affairs during the whole of the sixteenth century, without incurring some moral contamination. It was almost impossible to proceed a step without some violation of feeling—some trespass upon the natural or acquired rights of man—some association with decidedly wicked agents. We make these remarks at present, in allusion to the Regent Morton, who, being in such a situation as enabled him to promote the main objects of the English Government, appears to have been so upheld by Elizabeth, as to subject the latter to the reproach of having countenanced him in all his wicked actions; for that he was a very bad man we cannot attempt to deny, nor are we disposed to bestow that praise on Elizabeth or her Ministers as should seem to exempt them from all blame in the eyes of sentimentalists; but it is surely excusable, considering the noble stand they made against the tyrants and bigots of other countries, to protect them as far as justice will admit, from being made to bear the whole blame of transactions in which others had quite as great a share, as well as to scrutinise more narrowly the motives upon which they may be supposed to have acted, in order to discriminate between such as were altogether political, and such as must be referred only to natural causes.

The following passage from Dr. Gilbert Stuart's History of Scotland, may help to illustrate what we mean. Speaking of Elizabeth's mysterious treatment of the Duke of Anjou, who, at the beginning of this year, quitted the kingdom for ever,* he remarks, " Elizabeth, however, while she gratified her appetite for the fopperies of gallantry, was acting under the impulse of polii cal motives While she amused the Court of France with this treaty of alliance, she effectually restrained it from affording any aid to the Scottish Princess; and the success of her intrigues was the more agreeable to her, as she was deeply impressed with apprehensions that the Duke of Anjou might match with a daughter of Spain, and have the Low Countries for her portion. If this event should happen, she held it for certain, that France and Spain would unite with ardour to advance the interests of Mary—would find a wife for the King of Scots—and would exert their fullest powers to make a conquest of England, and overthrow the Protestant religion."

* It was in February (not June, as very erroneously printed in Lord Burghley's Diary in Murdin), that this Prince took his departure from London for Flanders, every thing being provided for his passage, by order of her Majesty, in the most princely style, the Queen herself accompanying him as far as Canterbury, and deputing many Lords and Knights to attend him as far as Antwerp, where he was to receive the Ducal Crowns of Brabant, Limburgh, and Lorraine. The attendance, in point of numbers, was quite extraordinary. Leicester alone is reported to have taken with him a hundred Knights and Gentlemen, and more than three hundred serving-men; and others in proportion. At Rochester, Sittingbourne, and Canterbury, her Majesty feasted the whole train; and finally, to all appearance, parted from Monsieur most reluctantly, and with great grief. On the 7th of February, the Prince and his whole party embarked, and arrived safely at Flushing, where he was received by the Prince of Orange with all possible honours. It would be very much beyond our purpose to enter into the particulars of the Duke's arrival and reception at Flushing and Antwerp, but whoever is desirous of information upon these heads, may be amply gratified by consulting Hollinshed's Chronicles, or Nichols's Progresses, vol. ii. The Duke was unsuccessful in his views upon Flanders, which were soon discovered to be altogether selfish; and, being compelled to return to France, died prematurely in 1584. It is melancholy to have to relate, that this Prince's own sister, Marguerite of Navarre, has affirmed, that if fraud and infidelity had been banished from the earth, there was in him a stock sufficient of both from which it might have been replenished. Voltaire, speaking of the Duke's attempt upon Flanders, says, " In all ages there have been conspiracies of the people against Princes, but this Prince conspired against the people." If these things were true,—and there is no great cause to doubt it, it must be impossible for any reader to peruse the fulsome compliments paid to him at Antwerp, amply recorded in Mr. Nichols's Progresses, without feelings of disgust.

It is impossible to read this passage without being struck with the imputations cast on Elizabeth, as though she could be thinking of nothing but the continual persecution of Mary; indulging apprehensions, altogether groundless, of dangers from the friends of that unhappy Princess; and pursuing her own selfish ends to the gratification of the most disgraceful private feelings, totally regardless of the feelings of others, either public or private. We are astonished that so able a man as Dr. Stuart, could fancy that such a passage would escape examination.

Certainly the times in which Elizabeth lived, were not times when we should be justified in looking for any very refined or acute feelings, especially upon a despotic throne. We must admit, that Elizabeth was sadly destitute of the amiable softnesses of her sex, and appears to have felt, at times, but little for her fallen sister; but she probably knew how little Mary felt for her; that "woman of England," as she sometimes disdainfully called Elizabeth: and as to the dangers to be apprehended from the Catholic friends of Mary at all times, we cannot think they could have been exaggerated. We say, the Catholic friends of Mary, because it would be difficult to say what real friends that unfortunate Princess now had. Charles IX. of France, had a regard for her bordering upon attachment; but Henry III., who was entirely under the influence of his mother, Catherine de Medicis, could scarcely be expected to feel much for Mary, as a Guisian; while Spain was more likely to enter into confederacies against Elizabeth than in favour of Mary.

By the extreme care, prudence, and vigilance of such Ministers, as no Sovereign before or since perhaps ever had, the cloud which for upwards of forty years hung over Elizabeth, did not actually burst upon her; but that she was for ever in danger of being entirely overwhelmed by it, had it burst, we can entertain no doubt from the history of the times; it was only indeed by now and then interrupting its accumulation, or lessening its weight, that the mischief was averted. In doing which, with the exception only of the deplorable imprisonment and death of Mary, we do not believe that any art was practised, or any force used, that would not equally have been practised or used against Elizabeth by the enemies with whom she had to deal, could they have once found the opportunity; and had she fallen as much into their power, as Mary fell into the power of Elizabeth, we do not say she would have been incarcerated for the long space of eighteen years, and finally executed, but we do say, that the history of the times afford ground to think that her end would only have been a more accelerated one. The general system of European politics in short was such, that the best perhaps that can be said of it is, that, as want of confidence encouraged artifice, artifice produced want of confidence—as all expected to be over-reached by their neighbours, if opportunity should serve, the only security seemed to consist in being the first, or the most crafty, to deceive.*

Scotland, it must be admitted, was from the time of Henry VIII. a sad field for such contentions; not so much between the English and the Scots, as between the former and the French, if not the Catholic powers generally. Through the minister, Randolph, whose name will never be forgotten in the annals of North Britain, a plan is thought to have been pursued by England, not to be justified on any moral principle. Under a pretence of healing subsisting differences, it has been judged that his chief object, in his several missions to Scotland, was rather to prevent than promote an union between the contending parties, well knowing that England's security much depended on the divisions amongst them; and that if the King's or Protestant party was not kept up and fostered, as a party, by England; France and Scotland would soon have been united against her, and against the Protestant Church of both realms. But this was the system of Europe generally; France, in her jealousy of Spain, was forward to favour the revolt of the Netherlands, and Spain was equally bent upon fomenting the feuds and jealousies that prevailed in France; and, to bring things nearer home, at all times eager to keep Ireland in a state of revolt from England. Under these circumstances, it is not to be wondered that England should have wished to keep them both so occupied and engaged with their domestic affairs, as might prevent their attacking her, either directly, or by way of Scotland; and, indeed, it is probable, that in the French Minister Verac, a match was to be found for Randolph, and that the intrigues of England in Scotland were not of so great extent as those of France, Spain, Rome, &c., especially while the Duke of Alva held the government of the Netherlands.

* Want of confidence was, probably, one of the chief causes of the ruin of Mary Queen of Scots. Elizabeth is said repeatedly to have declared, that, with regard to the liberation of Mary, the only object was security. Give me sufficient security, she would say, and she shall be liberated to-morrow. Where was this security to be sought? Among none of Mary's friends certainly. Elizabeth stood disinherited, to all intents and purposes, in the eyes of Catholics, by two Popish Bulls. It had been asserted, as a maxim amongst Catholics, that Princes' promises were not generally binding; and that, at all events, faith was not to be kept with heretics. Philip II. had proscribed the Prince of Orange as a heretic and rebel, and invited assassination, by a proffered reward of five and twenty thousand crowns for those who would slay him. In the very edict of proscription, Philip acknowledged that he had violated his oath to the Flemings, but that the Pope had released him from the obligation of that oath. Fifty thousand crowns had been offered in France for the head of the Admiral Coligni, father-in-law of the Prince of Orange, before he fell a victim, in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which was of itself quite sufficient to destroy all confidence between Catholics and Protestants. "The Prince of Orange," says Voltaire, "had been Philip's subject, and now he becomes his equal, by being proscribed." In fact, nothing was left to his choice, but an armed defiance. He resisted Philip, as Stadholder of the Seven Provinces, and thereby laid the foundation of their perfect independence.

We have seen, under the year 1580, what hazard there seemed to be of James's being brought to abandon the amity of England, and the Protestant cause, through the influence of the two Stuarts, d'Aubigny and Arran, and their friends and associates. There can be very little doubt that, to speak familiarly, a game was on foot against England, in the influence these two young Noblemen were seeking to obtain over the King, and the endeavours they were making to emancipate him from the Regency of Morton. As d'Aubigny came from France, and was known to be in the confidence of the Guises, the Kirk of Scotland soon took the alarm; but to quiet such fears, he suffered himself to be converted by James,* and went through the ceremony of a public abjuration of the superstitions and idolatry of the Church of Rome; but not altogether with the effect he had anticipated, as at the very period of his conversion and abjuration, as we have before observed, dispensations from Rome happened to be interrupted, which permitted the Roman Catholics to promise, swear, and subscribe whatever might be required of them, if they should but continue resolute to advance secretly their religion.

What was thought of these things at Paris, the following passage from a letter, published by Dr. Birch, may serve to shew: Mr. Faunts, writing to Mr. Anthony Bacon, says, "As I was about to break off, mine old friend Piseum telleth me that there are 10,000 men levied secretly about Poictou and Gascony, to surprise the King of Navarre and Prince of Condé, or do some other mischief thereabouts, whilst the Queen Mother is in conference with them. This fellow, being of some judgment in those matters, is assured, that as well here, as in Scotland, and in Flanders by Monsieur, there is a great piece of treason in hand. It is said that there is newly come forth a protestation of the true religion in Scotland, against the Romish, procured by d'Aubigny, to keep them still in good opinion of him, till he hath wrought his purpose for which he was sent thither. Here (at Paris) is no talk but of murdering and combats every day by the courtiers; and that the pulpits ring against her Majesty and country for the death of the Jesuits, whereof there is a discourse newly re-printed, with the King's privilege, and in every street is cried by those that sell pamphlets, Les cruautés d'Angleterre, notwithstanding our new league, &c. &c."

But the influence of the King's new favourites hourly increasing, Morton was marked out as the victim of their intrigues, and a pretext was found for reviving the whole subject of Darnley's murder, to which the King's pardon, before mentioned, was not held to extend. By the exertions of Stuart of Ochiltree, Morton was brought to trial, convicted of having been a party to the King's death, and sentence being passed upon him, he was carried to execution, on the 2d of June, 1581, and beheaded. Elizabeth, unwilling to abandon one who had contributed so much to uphold her influence over the King, interposed, but in vain; even her minister, Bowes, was insulted, for his endeavours to get Lennox removed from the Council, which attempt, indeed, probably hastened the end of Morton; and though Elizabeth, through Lord Burghley, resented, in strong terms, the insults offered to her minister, Bowes, yet it was too late to save the fallen Regent. The Prince of Orange remonstrated against what was going forward, plainly seeing in it new attempts, on the part of the Popish Princes of Europe, to dissolve the union between the British nations, which all the Protestants of Europe beheld with pleasure. But, for a more circumstantial account of all these proceedings,* and of the character of this last Regent of Scotland, we must refer the reader to other books. Stuart of Ochiltree, who brought him to the block, confessed, afterwards, that in order to arrive at the truth, he had sub-

* In a conversation holden with Drury the very day he died, a manuscript account of which is to be seen in the British Museum [Harleian MSS. xxxvi. 43], the Earl confessed that Bothwell communicated to him his designs, and told him that the Queen willed it; but for the latter he could obtain no warrant in the way of proof, though he seems not to have doubted the fact, saying that "she was the chief doer thereof." That he had the Queen's commandment to subscribe to her subsequent marriage with Bothwell: that he had never been a pensioner of England, nor had any other dealings with Elizabeth, than such as tended to the good of the King, his country, and his subjects. The MS. ends thus: "However he might have lived, those who saw him die, must confess that he ended his life as a good man, and not as his foes allege, that having lived proudly, he died proudly."

Not long after the death of Morton, the two favourites, d'Aubigny (made Duke of Lennox), and Stuart of Ochiltree, who had, strangely enough, become Earl of Arran, became jealous of each other; and falling into disgrace with many of the principal persons in Scotland, a conspiracy was formed against them, the principal object being to seize upon the person of the King first, and thereby to overthrow the power both of Lennox and Arran. Such was the extraordinary attempt of what has been called the Raid of Ruthven (the family name and seat of the Earls of Gowrie), where, by a very extraordinary mode of interposition, James was effectually separated from his obnoxious companions, and persuaded, as it was thought, to abandon them. Lennox, indeed, soon quitted Scotland ;* but the Earl of Arran was not so easily to be disposed of. Though much the worse and most dangerous man of the two, he found means to re-establish himself in the King's favour, and to have his revenge of the Earl of Gowrie. The delivery of the King, however, from the pernicious counsels of his two favourites, by the bold attempt of the Raid of Ruthven, was so approved by England, the Clergy, and a Convention of the Three Estates, as to secure the conspirators from all immediate judicial proceedings. It was at this time, and upon this occasion, that Mary, conceiving her son to be almost as much in a state of personal thraldom as herself, wrote an expostulatory letter to Elizabeth, which is more to be admired for its vigour, and the unsubdued spirit it breathes, than for its wisdom or prudence ; and, indeed, if the history of Europe, during, not only the reign of Elizabeth, but of her father, brother, and sister, did not supply some answer to it, it could only remain for ever as a most dreadful charge against England, and against one of its most renowned Sovereigns. We say the history of Europe, because it has been our constant

* He passed through England on his way to France, being compelled, by illness ; but was received with great attention there, being even admitted to the Queen's presence, who, in very mild terms, reproached him, as it is said, for his misgovernment of the affairs of Scotland. That he had made inroads upon the Reformed Church, is very evident from the following passage, in a letter from Lord Burghley to Sir George Cary, Sept. 13, 1582, published by Mr. Ellis. " I hope the credit of the Ministers of the Gospel will help to build up the breaches that the Duke and accomplices made in that Church and realm." Soon after his arrival in France, he died, affirming himself to be a sincere Pretestant. James has the credit given him of sincerely lamenting his death, and being kind to his family.—Robertson, Hume, and Stuart.

care to look there for the public motives of Elizabeth's conduct, as well as of the conduct of her Ministers, in this most deplorable business; entirely believing that a great deal too much of it has been attributed only to private motives, to the blackening of the characters not only of Elizabeth herself, but of her great minister, Lord Burghley, who is scarcely ever allowed to escape the censures passed upon Elizabeth. Mary's letter, to which we now allude, as written from one female to another, from one Queen to another, and most of all from a Queen persecuted and oppressed, as the world believes, to her chief persecutor and oppressor, can never, we are persuaded, be read by persons unacquainted with the true history of things, without horror, and the liveliest resentment of the wrongs insisted upon; and, indeed, we cannot wish to weaken the force of it by any other remarks, than as it deserves to be considered, that it was addressed to a person disinherited, almost before her birth, of all regal rights, by the man at Rome,* and whose crown and whose life were never safe from the machinations of those who were watching every opportunity of setting Mary in her place. To one, besides, who had been bred up pretty well to know and to understand what

* We allude to the Bull of the irascible Paul III. against Henry VIII. in which all the descendants of that Monarch stood proscribed, as entirely incapacitated to succeed to any of his dominions, honours, dignities, or possessions. Elizabeth was scholar enough to be able to weigh the force of all the terrors of proscription in the original. Such as "Omnes et singulos Henrici regis filios, aliosque déscendentes (nemine excepto, nullaque minoris ætatis, aut sexus, vel ignorantiæ vel alterius cujusvis causæ habitâ ratione) dignitatibus, dominiis, &c. privatos et ad illa ac alia in posterum obtinenda, inhabiles esse decernimus, et inhabilitamus. Decernimus quod Henricus Rex,—necnon præfati descendentes, ex tunc infames existant, ad testimonia non admittantur, testamenta facere non possunt, &c.—See vol. i. 69; and Burnet's Collection of Records, History of the Reformation, vol. i. This Bull was published in 1535. Had it been possible for Elizabeth to have forgotten it, when she ascended the throne, the Pope then reigning, Paul IV., may be said to have very carefully reminded her of it, by pronouncing her to be a bastard and an usurper, and Mary of Scotland the right Queen of England; and, as if this were not enough to put her on her guard, Pius V., in the year 1569, undertook to discharge all her subjects from their allegiance, and, as "Prince over all people and all kingdoms," to "deprive the said Elizabeth of her pretended title to the kingdom." This could be little likely to incline her heart to give full liberty to the very person Pope Pius, as well as his predecessor, had declared to be the rightful inheritor of the crown she wore; and yet, as though intended to do Mary all the ill it could, in the eyes of Elizabeth, and the English Protestants, it appeared not only in the second year of her abode in England, but in the very year when a rebellion was raised in the North for her delivery out of the power of Elizabeth. Let us add to the above, the extreme ignominy with which the memory of Elizabeth's mother had been loaded, by Popes, Cardinals, &c.

penalties she had incurred in the eyes of all the Catholic Powers of Europe, not only by the part she had taken in religion, but by presuming to grasp the sceptre of England, as the unworthy daughter of the much reviled Queen Anne, and to the immediate prejudice of Mary. Could we be expected to grant that the letter expresses not only what Mary did feel, but what she had a full right to feel in regard to the hardships she had endured, yet it certainly does not express what Elizabeth probably knew, namely, that had Mary never been exposed to those hardships, in impediment of her designs, or of the designs of her partizans and adherents, the English crown would not have remained so long on her own head. The competition, in short, between these two extraordinary women seems to us to have been of such a nature, from the moment Elizabeth ascended the throne of England, that it is not to be wondered, that there should have been a common feeling, that the liberty, if not the life of the one, depended on the bodily restraint or death of the other. Vita Mariæ, Mors Elizabethæ; Vita Elizabethæ, Mors Mariæ, &c. Of Elizabeth's extreme hardness of heart, and cruelty, we have great doubts, especially with regard to Mary. We believe that England was at the first a shelter to her from the fury of her own subjects, and we believe that, to the very last, Elizabeth was averse from shedding the truly royal blood that flowed in Mary's veins, if, consistently with her own safety, it could have been avoided. As we draw nearer and nearer to the last scene of this deep tragedy, we cannot help feeling more and more deeply for the credit of Lord Burghley, as connected with that of his royal mistress. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that they were the worst people in the world,* though we have, in our researches, had to endure the pain and mortification of being compelled frequently to read of them as such, in works of too great repute, as we think, with the world in general.

It seems to have been very much overlooked that Mary had another enemy, destitute of all fair excuses for her enmity, a female too, and a Queen, one to whom she might more reasonably have looked for succour when she was compelled to quit Scotland, than to Elizabeth. We mean, of course, Catherine

* It is recorded, to the honour of Henry the Great of France, that he imbibed no vice but gallantry, in the profligate court of Charles IX. " for never was there more vicious and corrupt impiety, Atheism, magic, nay, even the most disgusting and filthy depravity, with base cowardice and perfidy, since poisons and assassinations reigned there in a sovereign degree." The same author gives Henry credit for having preserved a generous and humane heart, amidst such horrors and abominations.--See Henry the Great and his Court.

de Medicis, under whose eye she had been brought up; and, if we may trust Conæus, with such grateful returns of filial attachment, and such exemplary obedience, as to render it one of the brightest periods of Mary's life. And yet Catherine is known to have borne a mortal hatred towards her, for what she could no more help, than she could have helped being born Queen of Scotland, we mean her connexion with the Guises. This Queen did not hesitate to maintain, and to teach her sons, that cruelties were just and allowable, if politically useful; and sure enough she made the experiment in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, as her own daughter, Marguerite, Queen of Navarre, has informed us; for she was a witness of the preparations in the very interior of the palace, yet so ignorant of her mother's horrid purposes, that when Catherine ordered her to go to bed, she obeyed, though her sister, the Duchess of Lorrain, who was more in the secret, hung upon her with tears, and in the very presence of her mother, besought her not to go.—[See the Memoirs of Marguerite de France, Queen of Navarre.] Elizabeth has been blamed for fomenting divisions among her enemies, but Catherine, to preserve her own power, encouraged dissensions at Court, and even among her children, and so embarrassed Henry III. by these quarrels and contentions, as to render it impossible for him to govern the realm without her. She had, nevertheless, strong points in her character, and knew how to render herself popular; but by no means by such truly royal and patriotic acts as was the case with Elizabeth. Our great Queen is often spoken of as a paragon of dissimulation; but Mary's own mother (otherwise a good woman) excelled in this art, and even boasted, as we have observed before, when she abandoned the Protestants of Scotland, that no faith was to be kept with heretics or rebels; and that Princes' promises were not always to be holden. Such were some of Elizabeth's contemporaries; royal contemporaries, for they were all Queens! It is not fair to judge Elizabeth or her Ministers by a more modern standard of excellence, unless all the other parties be brought to the same test. Knox, who, though rude and uncourteous in manner, has the credit of being honest, has told us that, in his conferences with Mary, "he never discovered such art in woman before." The author of the Court of Henry the Fourth of France, after detailing many horrid circumstances of ferocity, in politics, warfare, love, and gallantry, sums up the whole with saying, that, "in short, at that period, every sentiment was characterised by the most vehement passions," vol. i. 149, 150, &c.; and, indeed, the following story may serve to shew, that Mary herself was not free from such emotions: when Knox was put upon his trial for treason, Mary entered the court, and seeing him stand at the foot of the table, uncovered, burst into a loud fit of laughter. "That man," said she, "has made me weep, and shed never a tear himself: I will now see if I can make him weep;" and her active keenness against him, when she thought she had him in her power, gave offence even to her own Ministers, and the Judges of the cause.

But we are still as much as ever inclined to believe that the true history of Mary Queen of Scots begins, where we began it, in our first volume, namely in the reign of Henry VIII., when France interposed to embarrass the two great divisions of our British island, and rudely snatched away the prize which seemed, by an act of Providence, to be falling into the lap of England, in proud defiance and mockery of the father, the brother, and the country of Mary's subsequent competitor, Queen Elizabeth. We are fully prepared to maintain, notwithstanding all Mary's pathetic and interesting complaints, that she was not the victim of English cruelty but of French interference, Spanish jealousy and resentment, and the most unappeasable Popish vengeance; perhaps we might add, to the above, to the indiscretions of her Minister, the Bishop of Ross.

For one who lived and wrote at the time has not hesitated to impute to that busy and artful Prelate, the increased rigours of Mary's captivity; captivity indeed he is unwilling to call it, till rendered so by the officiousness and indiscretion of Mary's own friends; after remarking that Elizabeth had refused to deliver her up to those subjects who had been the first authors of her disgrace and renunciation of her crown, he observes, that she [Elizabeth] did, with extreme sorrow, lament both their fortunes; to each other so adverse and so uncomfortable, and that they should seem fatally born to be authors of their own woe, being so near a-kin, so near neighbours, so equal in years, sex, and degree;* and next, speaking of the first years of Mary's sojournment in England, he observes, "I call it her abode, and no captivity, nor scarcely a restraint; where, in effect, the greatest part of the realm was her prison at large, (having some eye to her safe custody,) and the finest palace of every shire the place of her residence; where she might hunt and hawk, and use all other princely disports, at her pleasure; and was allowed honourable company and attendance, great entertainment, costly diet, and rich presents; free access of her people to her, conferences with whom she would, and liberty to give and receive whatsoever intelligence from any part of the world by her secretaries or messengers: finally, for her greater comfort and reputation, an embassador leiger to negotiate matters with her Majesty, &c., which continued many fair years, until the foul abuses of the Bishop of Rosse gave just cause why that friendly course of negotiation should be discontinued and interrupted."

Many of these remarks are corroborated by the public papers of those times. The charges of her household were very great: one of the first Peers of the realm dwelt in the same houses; and which, indeed, might comparatively be called palaces. She seems not to have been stinted as to many remarkable expenses; for, as we have before observed, she bathed in wine. Her hunting and hawking were so noticed by the French Court, that she was scarcely regarded there as a captive; and as to her intercourse with foreign states, she often let Elizabeth know what she could do, if she chose, by her correspondence with Spain, France, and her own party in Scotland. In the very letter of which we are speaking, Mary beseeches Elizabeth to " reassume the natural kindness of her disposition."

The same author, in another part, writes, that the Queen was careful of Mary's health. " When ill, she sent her own physician, and the most precious drugs and preservatives that could be gotten, for the recovery of her health and prolongation of her life :* albeit, her Majesty was not ignorant that her death had been a great deal more for her safety, the present contentment of her people, and future tranquillity of the realm."

We have taken the opportunity of speaking of this letter, because it was particularly connected with the Raid of Ruthven, and was designed to engage Elizabeth to liberate James from the bondage in which he seemed to be held; but, as Rapin has observed, " she took a very improper way to obtain this favour, since her letter is full of reproaches for the barbarous usage she met with." And indeed, if the same author is right, Elizabeth's concern in the business is very curious, for he states, that she had received advice from Henry III. that the Guises were plotting something in favour of the Queen of Scots, and

* We cannot forbear calling the attention of the reader to one circumstance pretty generally believed at the time, namely, that had Elizabeth chosen to have Mary poisoned, (so common a crime in those days,) Leicester is said to have had a physician ready for such purposes; but Elizabeth did really send her own physician, for more honest and honourable purposes.

were about to embark troops in Normandy, pretended to be for Flanders, but destined as he thought for England or Scotland.* This intelligence had interrupted some negotiation on foot with Mary, through Sir Walter Mildmay,† who was now recalled, and an English minister sent to the King in Scotland, at the very time that another was known to have repaired thither from the King of France, to give support, if possible, to the two favourites, "knowing those who seized the King were all friends to England."‡ From which we may perceive,

* See also Strype's Annals, iii. 112, 113. In Lodge's Illustrations of British History, vol. ii. p. 274, Elizabeth is said to have received this information from Henry IV. of France. This could not be; and probably, as Henry III., as Rapin observes on the occasion, had no reason to be pleased with Elizabeth, it was only his jealousy of the Duke of Guise that induced him to interfere. See also Camden, 274.

† It is impossible to be too circumspect in the examination of this portion of the English History; and we might reasonably add, the Scottish. A proposition seems to have been made by Mary, in the latter end of the year 1581, to admit her son to a share at least of royal power, or to have him acknowledged as King, to rule jointly with his mother, in subjection to the will of Elizabeth; and Beale and Sir Walter Mildmay were sent to Mary to confer on these subjects; but it is exceedingly certain, that at this very time endeavours were making in Scotland to draw the King away from England, and liberate his mother if they could. All this was in hand, and carrying forwards, by persons notoriously in the French interest, on the side of the Catholics, and inveterate enemies to Elizabeth. This was the period chosen by Mary to make her proposals; and there can be very little doubt but that the Duke of Guise was at the bottom of it, and Lennox and Arran his accomplices or agents; and the other enemies of England prepared to take advantage of any success the former might meet with. Their plan was, to persuade James to permit his mother to a participation of the regal authority.—Lodge, ii. 280. Mary's letter is highly plausible, but there is not a sentence of it which would not admit of such an elucidation, from a correct view of the affairs of Europe, as might turn the scale on Elizabeth's side; at least, in point of policy and self-defence. Morton's confession had encouraged Mary to insist again on her perfect innocence; but Morton's confession only went to the length of acquitting her of giving any written authority for the proceedings against Darnley. Mr. Lodge, in his notes, recommends this letter strongly to the perusal of those who would wish to "obtain a clear knowledge of Mary's true character, and of Elizabeth's detestable conduct towards her in the last years of her imprisonment." We confess we have been compelled, by the course and drift of our researches, to read more of the History of Europe at the period referred to, than will allow us to subscribe to Mr. Lodge's opinion. We do not think any man competent, in these days, to decide upon the true characters either of Elizabeth or Mary. Though we have a very high respect for Mr. Lodge and his labours, we think his Illustrations of British History would have been more valuable, if a few of his own illustrations had been suppressed—not all, certainly.

‡ It was not uncommon to designate the King's party as "the faction in the English interest," as if that party could have no patriotic designs in hand, or any other interest in view, but that of that the contest England had in Scotland, was still with France or Spain, who, in all they were doing, had their views upon England, not merely for the rescue of Mary, but, if possible, to turn the King aside from that alliance, and from his religion; for could they have got him once into their power, it is presumed they intended to match him with some Catholic Princess. But as we are breaking in now upon the transactions of another year, we shall terminate here our consideration of the affairs of Scotland, observing only, that from a particular passage in one of Lord Burghley's letters to Sir Francis Walsingham, August 10, 1581, it would seem that his Lordship was not much consulted upon what was passing in that kingdom at this period. The passage we allude to is as follows:—"In Scotland, the King pretendeth to keep amity; yet, by Ashton, secretly I learn, that he will be wholly guided by her Majesty, whereof she conceiveth hope. I pray God she be not deceived therein; and hereby I fear her Majesty will be slower to hearken to the assistance with France; and yet her Majesty uttereth not to me these Scottish matters, but I learn them otherwise."*

The Lord Treasurer, indeed, would seem to have had more to do with the affairs of the Church this year, than of the State,† from what occurs in Strype. His first care was in respect to an unpleasant dispute on foot relative to the Chancellorship of the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, in which the Bishop (Overton), having fallen under the displeasure of Leicester, was compelled to seek justice at the hands of Lord Burghley, "as one of those whom he (the Bishop), judged to have great care of the public causes," and "always wont in England; both countries, however, had one great interest in common, namely, emancipation from Popish tyranny and foreign influence. As we had no opportunity of being acquainted with Mr. Turner's sentiments concerning Scotland, when we had occasion to discuss some of Lord Burghley's earliest advice, on Elizabeth's accession, we beg leave now to refer to what he has said of the interference of England with the Scottish affairs, in the nineteenth chapter of the second book of his History of the Reign of Elizabeth, vol. i. pp. 584, 588.

* Digges, 373.

† The Queen, however, held communications with the Protestant Princes of Germany, in the course of the year, as well as with the city of Geneva, oppressed by the Duke of Savoy, which communications were chiefly carried on through Lord Burghley; see in Strype's Annals, iii. 127, 128. and Appendix xv. xvi. the letters addressed to his Lordship by Wierus, the city of Geneva, and Beza; the latter of whom speaks of that kindness and benignity in his Lordship, of which all foreigners were wont to speak. See, for a fuller account of the case of Geneva, Strype's Life of Grindal, b. ii. ch. 14. Ann. 1582.

these and other his suits to give him honourable countenance." "I would not," he says, "willingly have named in these my letters, my Lord of Leicester, but that he hath gone about, as your Lordship knoweth, to draw you from me by hard information; which forceth me to write, to say more than otherwise I would gladly do." "His Lordship (Leicester) hath given, and doth still give, great countenance to those that work me all my sorrow; a Nobleman, as your Lordship knoweth, far above my power and ability to withstand; and therefore right sure to undo me, if he will; if I should hold out and have no stay." "I received, in King Edward's time, by your Lordship's means, when I was a scholar in Oxenford, one of his Highness's exhibitions, given out of the Abbey of Glassenbury to my great relief and comfort. I obtained, in the beginning of the Queen's Majesty's reign that now is, by your Lordship's means, one of the best Prebends in Winchester. I had given me of her Majesty not long after, by your Lordship's means, the parsonage of Rotherfield, in Sussex, a thing better worth than 200*l.* by the year. Let my Lord of Leicester shew any one thing worth twopence, that ever I had by his means, either of the Queen, or of any body else, and I will confess myself his debtor for all. And as for the bishoprick I now have, if it be any benefit to me, your Lordship knoweth and I know, and must confess, I had it as much by your Lordship's means as by his: although I must needs say, first intended unto me by him." "His Lordship hath cast me off without cause, and I will win him again by your Lordship's means if I can; only I must crave pardon of his Lordship, if I bear a dutiful heart unto others that have deserved of me as much, and more than he hath done."

But Lord Burghley had a more distressing case than this, to adjust for his old friend Sandys, Archbishop of York, who had been shamefully used by one Sir Thomas Stapleton, a Knight of Yorkshire, bringing against him false accusations, in order to extort from him a good lease of lands, and a large sum of money; and who, besides having some interest with the Queen, had procured letters from her Majesty to his Grace, to further his purposes. In this dilemma the Archbishop knew not whither to turn for help, but to the Lord Treasurer. The case is fully related in Strype, but as it was one in which the Archbishop appears to have had to contend with her Majesty, as well as with his bad and cruel neighbour, Sir Thomas Stapleton, we cannot forbear transcribing some parts of it, in justice to Lord Burghley, who so effectually stood his friend, as to bring the worthy Prelate out of all his troubles.

"My good Lord,—In rebus adversis amicus certus cernitur. I find myself more bound unto you than to any man living. At a dead lift you are my most faithful friend. I have need of your present help: otherwise like to be oppressed with great and shameful wrong. False informers have prevented me. I was upon the way fully purposed to have opened unto you their treachery, and to have prayed your aid for their condign punishment. My only fault is, that I have concealed the thing so long. Hereof, my Lord, assure yourself I am in this matter, wherewith they chiefly charge me, most innocent from all criminal fact; so that you need not fear to defend my just cause.—I know your Lordship in respect of God's cause, and in respect of innocence, and somewhat of me, your old poor well-willer, will not suffer these wicked men to escape condign punishment." And, indeed, no sooner had his Lordship made the Queen thoroughly acquainted with the vile and base conspiracy contrived against his friend, than she expressed her great anger and resentment of so notorious a crime; and forthwith sent letters from the Court, to summon the culprits to answer the accusations laid against them. The issue of which was, that by the Treasurer's great care, every thing was discovered, and the wickedness of the conspirators brought to light, insomuch, that the Queen sent to her Vice Chamberlain, Sir Christopher Hatton, to signify her consent to all the proceedings; who, in a letter to Lord Burghley, thus discharged his commission.

"My very good Lord,—I thank God from my heart that your trouble in this great cause hath brought forth so blessed an effect. Innocency is delivered. Truth hath prevailed, to God's glory, and due commendation of your wisdom and goodness. Her Majesty rejoiceth exceedingly in it, and yieldeth her most gracious thanks to your Lordship, for your so grave and wise proceeding in it. My Lord of Leicester hath her Majesty's direction to signify thus much of her pleasure, with some further matter unto your Lordship. Feb. 24, 1582."

The Archbishop also wrote to him in the most grateful terms: "My honourable good Lord, I cannot requite your great goodness to me, but by most earnest prayer. All the rest that is in me is not able to answer unum pro mille. Without your constant favour and present help, doubtless mine innocence should have been condemned, and the wicked justified. But my God has raised you up to stand in the gap, for the trying further of this treachery, and the clearing of mine innocency. May the Lord Jesus requite you seven-fold in your bosom."

Stapleton acknowledged his abominable treachery, being, indeed, convicted thereof before the Council; but, as the Archbishop wrote, "not penitently but threateningly." In fact, he seemed still to harbour ill designs against the Archbishop, who was obliged, therefore, again to apply to the Lord Treasurer, and he, as soon as he heard it, sent his servant, Maynard, to Lord Leicester, to desire him to acquaint the Queen with it; who forthwith informed his Lordship that he had done so, and that her Majesty highly resented Sir Thomas's obstinacy; and would have him committed to the Fleet; that she feared his Lordship's (Lord Burghley's) sickness might hinder it, which his Lordship's travail had brought to so good pass. So earnest, said the Earl, was her Majesty to have the matter truly well handled, for the trial of the truth, and purgation of the Bishop.

"Thus," the letter concludes, "have I done her Majesty's commandment, touching this matter: being loth and sorry to trouble your Lordship, knowing how much troubled you are otherwise, but her Majesty reposeth great confidence in your discretion. "R. Leycester."

A fresh commission after this was sent down to examine witnesses, and bring the case to a better issue. This produced another letter from the Archbishop to Lord Burghley, in which he says, "If your Lordship had not stood stoutly at the stern, to break the violent charges of the sea, doubtless ere this, I had suffered shipwreck." Stapleton, however, behaved so ill, even in the management of his confessions, of which he made a sort of mockery, that he was finally not only fined, but committed to the Tower, where he remained nearly two years, being driven himself to implore the aid of Lord Burghley, to get him released.

In the sixth chapter of Strype's Life of Bishop Aylmer, it may be seen, how earnest Lord Burghley was, to assist that learned Prelate, not only with his assistance, but with his advice; which latter, tending to moderate his proceedings against the Puritans, how kindly and submissively it was taken by the Bishop, may be seen by the letter he wrote the Treasurer, assuring him that he "agreed with his Lordship in judgment, as one by whom he had even desired to be directed, and would be still, if it pleased him to grant him that favour that he might. For his wisdom, zeal, experience, learning, and godliness (he thanked God), he accounted to be such, that he would think himself happy to be directed by him in all points." The Bishop met with troubles at Court, through the resentment of the Puritans, who, having Leicester and others on their side, raised complaints against him for injuring the revenues of the bishoprick, by felling wood [a becoming complaint from that party, who would, if they could, have divided all the Episcopal revenues among themselves]. In all these cases the Bishop sought the aid of Lord Burghley, who did all he could do to help him, and procure him justice, as appears from the following letter from the Bishop himself to that Lord. "My good Lord, I cannot but honour you for carrying yourself with so great equity before her Majesty in my late cause. You have so won my heart (though God is my witness you had it before), that you shall be the man to whom I will trust (under God), whom I will only choose for my judge in all cases, and honour as my most noble friend at all times; and in some part be thankful as I may, but never as you deserve." "Thus," says Strype, "did this good man's soul run out, as though it had been melted down with the seasonable kindness of this noble person; whose uprightness was such, that he used not to favour any, but those whose innocency or other circumstances required it."

As this celebrated Bishop professed himself so ready to follow the advice of Lord Burghley, it may not be amiss to mention another instance of the same nature, in the case of Dr. Matthews, nominated to the Deanery of Durham, this year, though not immediately inducted; to whom, on his departure from Court, being comparatively a young man, Lord Burghley gave, as his manner was, much good counsel, in regard to the discharge of his duties there; the Dean acknowledged his kindness by assuring him in a letter he wrote back, "that he did promise and desire, if any defect should appear, to be reformed by his authority, and directed by his wisdom therein, and in all things else, even as by the Socrates, or Solomon of his age." This learned divine became afterwards Bishop of Durham, and Archbishop of York.

Others of the Bishops, as Peterborough, Lincoln, and Hereford, were also brought into difficulties or trouble, and obliged severally to apply to the Lord Treasurer for assistance, or to procure justice to be done to them. To all of whom he paid attention; being, as Strype calls him, "the Clergy's chief patron, to whom they usually applied in their distresses and hardships."*

* It was about this time that Strype supposes Archbishop Grindal's sequestration was taken off.—See his Life of that Prelate, 403. His Grace was now become quite blind, and feeling himself unfit for the duties of his high station, obtained her Majesty's permission to resign, which he had before sought. He had the gratification of knowing, before his retirement, that he had recovered the Queen's favour, her Majesty having sent him, by the hands of Lord Burghley, a handsome piece of plate, as a new year's gift, and which he soon after bequeathed to that Noble Lord, in requital of his constant and unalterable friendship; to whom, next to her Majesty, he acknowledged that he stood indebted for all his preferments. The forms of resignation finding some hindrance and delay, this good Prelate terminated his life, after all, as Archbishop of Canterbury,

In the course of this year the chief-justiceship of the Court of Common Pleas being vacant, Serjeant Anderson was appointed to succeed to that high office. A report was circulated that there had been an endeavour made to obtain the post by bribery, but that it was defeated by "the just Lord Treasurer." Certain it is, that Fleetwood, the Recorder of London, writing to Lord Burghley, not only mentioned the report in his letter, but added, "that it was almost in every man's mouth, that his Lordship, after he had understanding of the offering of such a mass of money, was the means of keeping him (the briber), from that cushion," concluding, "Truly, my Lord, it was well done."*

We cannot avoid inserting the following acknowledgment of Strype in this part of his great work, as appertaining so much to the subject we are handling: "What passages of remark I meet with," says that diligent historian, "concerning that great and wise Statesman, Lord Burghley, I frequently enter, to preserve his memory to grateful posterity."†

It was towards the close of this year that Lord Burghley had the misfortune to lose his son-in-law, Mr. Wentworth, who died in the month of November. Lord Burghley being obliged to leave London on account of the plague, found him dead at his house at Theobalds. His Lordship received many kind letters of condolence on this occasion, from Secretary Walsingham, the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Leicester, and the Vice Chamberlain, Sir Christopher Hatton. The Queen also sent to his Lordship Mr. Manners, the Earl of Rutland's son, "under great sorrow, to comfort him from herself." The Lord Wentworth also, wrote to him in the most friendly terms upon the common loss they had sustained in the death of his son: "Many crosses had fallen upon him," says the afflicted father, "but none like this."

There was a curious book published this year, of which we feel ourselves dying on the 6th of July, 1583. Before he died he besought the Lord Treasurer and Sir F. Walsingham to be overseers of his will, in which were many charitable bequests. In the Journal of a London minister of those days, Strype found an entry of his death, with the following short character subjoined, Vir pius, mites, castus et bonus.

* Anderson gave great offence by his severity against the Puritans. In the Biographia Britannica the case is considered at length; in some instances he seems to have been unjustly censured by Pierce and Neal.

† In a letter from Whitgift, Bishop of Worcester, to Lord Burghley about this time, we find the following passage: "There is none with whom we of the Church either are or may be so bold as with your Lordship; neither is there any that may better make our case known to her Majesty—and therefore we rest in you."

called upon to give some account, as it was particularly dedicated, in a handsome Poem, to Mildred, "the learned Lady and Consort of Lord Burghley;" the title of the dedication running thus:—"Ad prænobilem, et in primis eruditam fœminam, utriusque literaturæ et Græcæ et Latinæ peritissimam, dominam MILDREDAM, dynastæ BURGHLÆI, magni Angliæ thesaurarii, conjugem laudatissimam."

The book had a Greek title, viz. Ειρηναρχια sive Elizabetha, and was the work of one Christopher Ockland, sometime Master of the Free School in Southwark, and afterwards of a school at Cheltenham. It was written in heroic Latin verse, and consisted of two books; the one entitled Anglorum Prælia, beginning at the year 1527, and ending with the year of the Queen's accession, 1558; the second, entitled Elizabetha, describing her life and happy reign to 1582. In this book the author gives characters of all that Queen's great Ministers; we are bound to copy the lines upon Lord Burghley himself, and are the more glad to have an opportunity of doing it, in vindication of ourselves, since they carry us back far into the history of his life, and while they speak of him as the earliest of Elizabeth's chosen Counsellors, very justly observe, that he was then a practised Statesman, and that his political eminence began long before her reign.*

They also speak of his conduct under the trying reign of Mary, and what is of greatest importance, they may be regarded as presenting us with a picture of his life, person, habits, and character, originally submitted to the judgment of his own contemporaries, sanctioned and approved by them, and that in a remarkable manner; for the book was made a school book by order of the Privy Council, conveyed in a letter to the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and signed by the Lords Lincoln, Warwick, Leicester, Sir James Croft, Sir Francis Knollys, Sir Christopher Hatton,† and Sir Francis Walsingham. We are aware that it may be objected, that a book containing passages complimentary to all these great personages, as well as the reigning sovereign, might be expected to receive such encouragement as the above, but still Lord Burghley had a prior claim to all of them, and had the compliments paid to him been more than he deserved, the distribution and circulation of the work would scarcely have been promoted by some of his immediate rivals. It is rather remarkable, that though Leicester's name appears to the order above, we look in vain for those of Burghley or Sussex. We proceed now, therefore, to the lines on Lord Burghley:—

† "He was of a spare and temperate diet, eating never of but two or three dishes, drinking never but thrice at a meal, and very seldom wine."—Life by a Domestic.

‡ That no mistake may arise from these words, which perhaps were meant to signify rather that he was not given to raillery, than that he was any enemy to innocent mirth, we shall extract the following passage from Fuller's Holy State, p. 257. speaking of Lord Burghley; "No man was more pleasant and merry at meals, and he had a pretty wit-rack in himself, to draw speech out of the most sullen and silent guest at his table, to shew his disposition in any point he should propound. Hottoman, in his description of an Ambassador, witnesseth so much, who had been at his table." The following occurs also, in Peacham's Complete Gentleman: "Augustus had always his mirth greater than his feasts. And Suetonius says of Titus (Vespasian's son), he had ever his table furnished with mirth and good company. And the old Lord Treasurer Burghley, howsoever employed in State affairs, at his table would lay all business by, and be heartily merry." p. 224.

In his Life by a Domestic, there are many passages to the like effect; "If he could get any of his old acquaintance, who could discourse of their youth, or of things past in old time; it was notable to hear what merry storyies he could tell." "Above all things, what business soever was in his head, it was never perceived at his table; where he would be so merry as one would imagine he had nothing else to do; directing his speech to all men, according to their qualities and capacities; so as he raised mirth out of all men's speeches, augmenting it with his own." He adds, however, "These his speeches, though they were merry, yet were so full of wisdom, as many came rather to hear his speeches, than to eat his meat; thus he loved to be merry himself, and liked and recommended all others, that were of pleasant natures, being discreet withal."

An attempt was made this year to assassinate the Prince of Orange, but the assassin being taken with two of his confederates, they were strangled and quartered, and their heads and limbs exposed, which the Catholics afterwards, under the Duke of Parma, caused to be taken down, and buried with every mark of respect and veneration.*

About this time Gregory XIII. published his famous Bull for reforming the Calendar, by cutting off at once ten days of the current year. It is much to be lamented, that any prejudices should stand in the way of the progress and improvement of real science; but it was certainly the case in this instance, the Protestants refusing to comply with the ordinance, merely because it came from Rome, thereby producing two other distinct reckonings, or the old and new stile, scarcely got rid of to this day.† Even this change produced some trouble to Lord Burghley; See Strype's Annals, ii. 526, 527. and for an account of the calculations on which it was founded, Hales's Chronology, London 1830, p. 51, 52. The Gregorian correction of the Julian year was not adopted in our own country before the year 1751. It is remarkable, that the correction is so accurately adjusted now, as to answer all the purposes of chronology and astronomy for 6000 years to come.

1583.]—We need not conceal from the reader, that through the whole course of our undertaking, the affairs of Scotland have been to us a continual source of uneasiness and embarrassment—prepossessed from the very first with the general impression, that the case of the unhappy Queen of that Country, as a case against Elizabeth and her great Minister Lord Burghley, was one that not only admitted of no clear excuse, but was even incapable of palliation, it may be easily conjectured with how great pain we turned to those books and writings, in which no measure of censure and abuse has been spared to blacken their characters, and hold them up to posterity as monsters of wickedness and cruelty. It struck us, however, that by pursuing our researches, if we could not succeed in lessening the horror with which it has been usual to contemplate this sad period of English History, something might be discovered that might help us to account better for what undoubtedly came to pass, than the old romantic story, with which the world has been, we will not say deceived, but in a considerable degree misled, for the long space of nearly three centuries.

† Very early in this year, died the Countess of Lennox, the mother of the Lady Arabella, and daughter of that strange woman, Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury. Mr. Ellis, vol. iii. 2d Series, has printed two letters, written by Lord and Lady Shrewsbury to Lord Burghley, on this occasion. Nos. CCIV. CCV. Mr. Ellis seems to suppose that Lord and Lady Shrewsbury called her daughter in these letters, because Gilbert Talbot, Lord Shrewsbury's son, had married her eldest sister Mary; but in truth, Lady Lenox was their daughter, as born of the Countess, by her second husband Sir William Cavendish.

The great point upon which, as it appears to us, the main question may be said to turn, as a charge against the two illustrious persons referred to, is this: Were the hardships imposed upon Mary, the mere effects of uncontrollable passions, groundless fears, and insidious artifice, or were they the result, almost regular result, of the confused state of Europe, which seemed to render the liberty, if not the lives of both Queens, absolutely incompatible?

Much more of course must have been known to those persons, immediately concerned at the time, in the government of the two Countries, than can now ever be known to, or discovered by the most diligent inquirers. This indeed must always be the case; but if it were ever true of the transactions of any given century, it must have been eminently so with regard to those of the sixteenth, when spies were rendered almost indispensably necessary, by the covert dealings, and deceptions, of most of the governing powers of Europe. It is rather to the credit of England, that in having recourse to this otherwise obnoxious system she was the most marked object of attack, and that in her case therefore the system was a defensive one. The misfortune has been, that in consequence of Mary's having fallen into the power of Elizabeth, instead of the latter having fallen into the power of her numerous enemies, Mary has been always looked upon as the harmless and persecuted victim, Elizabeth, as the wanton and ferocious persecutor; while the Ministers of the latter, instead of obtaining credit, for the vigilant precautions to which they had recourse, to preserve to her, her crown, her liberty and her life,* (all of which we firmly believe to have been constantly in jeopardy,) have been branded as paragons of deceit, cruelty, and state-craft.

* The following story may deserve to be repeated in a life of LordBurghley. The Poet Waller being in the King's closet once, with James II., his Majesty asked him how he liked a particular picture hanging there? "Sir," said Waller, "my eyes are dim, and I know not who it is." "It is the Princess of Orange," said the King. "Then," replied Waller, "she is like the greatest woman in the world." "Whom do you call so?" answered the King. "Queen Elizabeth," said Waller. "I wonder you should think so," replied the King, "but I confess she had a wise Council." "And Sir," said Waller, "did you ever know a fool choose a wise one?"

It so happens, however, that no period of history perhaps, has supplied so many documents for the elucidation of the events that were passing on the stage of Europe, as the sixteenth Century, and in a great measure, through the great care, and incessant attention of Lord Burghley. It is hard that he should suffer from the preservation of papers, which no man perhaps had a greater power of destroying; we can only account for his careful preservation of some of them, from the belief, that either he knew more of their real purport, than those who have come after him ever will know, or that in truth, he felt satisfied that he was most conscientiously doing his duty, whatever construction may have been since put upon his actions. To return however to the affairs of Scotland, with which we feel ourselves called upon to begin our account of the year 1583.

The Queen of Scots' "long letter," as Lord Burghley himself calls it in his Diary, was written, or at least dated, on the 8th of November, 1582. It is reported to have had a great effect on Elizabeth, and it would have been little to her credit had it been otherwise; for the complaints of hard usage which it contains, true or false, are very striking. But it appears, from the researches we have been able to make, that there was, at this very time, a deep double game playing against Elizabeth, by means of the French Ambassador, M. La Motte Fenelon.

The double game to which we allude, seems to have been this; that Mary in England should make a merit of consenting to acknowledge her son as King, while James in Scotland, in order to procure her release, should propose to admit her to a share of the Government; while there were those at hand, in the case of any such arrangement, ready to persuade James to marry a French or Spanish Princess, and restore the authority, or rather, the tyranny of the Pope: and what might have ensued from this, to the danger of Elizabeth, we leave to the reader's own conjecture.

As La Motte Fenelon had obtained the Queen's leave to repair to Scotland, on the part of the King of France, it was judged necessary to have some English Ministers there also, and Bowes and Davison were accordingly dispatched from the Court. Fenelon was soon found to be unmindful of his promises made in England, which were, to endeavour all he could to settle things in peace and quietness; instead of which, exceeding his pretended commission, he sought to disturb matters by drawing the King away from his present Counsellors, to return him, no doubt, into the hands of those more averse to the interests of England: of the suspicions entertained at the Court of these designs, an account may be found in Murdin, 372, in a copy of her Majesty's letter to Mr. Robert Bowes and William Davison, 13th January 1582-3. But of the objects of this French embassy, we will take the account of a writer very adverse to Elizabeth, Dr. Gilbert Stuart: "Henry III.," he says, "commanded Monsieur de Fenelon, his resident in England, to take the road to Edinburgh; and lest the English Court should fall upon a pretence to interrupt his journey, orders were given to Monsieur de Mainingville to embark for the port of Leith. His instructions to both were, to engage in measures to effectuate the liberty of James, to allure him to cordiality and friendship with France, to urge the association of Mary with him in the Government of Scotland, and to dissolve and weaken the English faction." These were the very objects England had been struggling so earnestly for many years to prevent, namely, to keep James clear of French influence, and firm in the interests of England. As to the terms, "English faction," we have treated of them before; they mean, indeed, no other than the Protestant party in Scotland, friendly to a perfect amity between the two divisions of the British island, and to a final and decisive renunciation of the Pope's authority, and the Romish religion. The designs of the French were seen through, and easily understood, by the Scottish Protestants, particularly the Clergy, and the Ambassadors of Henry had a hard task to defend themselves from the insults and abuse of the populace. The return of Mary upon the proposed principle of association, was loudly declaimed against, as dangerous to the Protestant interest, and James, to all appearance, began to perceive his error; but a sudden turn of affairs setting him at liberty again, and throwing him once more into the hands of Arran, he resolved to take vengeance upon the Lords of Ruthven, as they were called, and though most of them found means to make their escape, Gowrie himself was seized, and notwithstanding the King's previous pardon, tried, condemned, and executed.

It cannot be supposed, that such a state of things could plead much with the English Court in favour of Mary; in fact, the intrigues of the French became too manifest and intelligible, to leave any doubts on the minds of the Queen's Council in England, that the old objects of dispute and contention were revived, and that there was on the part of the French as great a struggle on foot as ever, to gain possession of the King, and through the King, of the kingdom, to the restoration of the Catholic Religion, the dissolution of all amity with England, and in case of Mary's release, a fresh attempt probably to obtain for her the Crown, which Elizabeth was held by all foreign Catholics to have usurped. Many, we know, will be disposed to deny these conclusions, as not regularly deduced from the premises, but we must confess we can put no other construction on the mission of Fenelon; connected as it appeared to be, with many movements among the Papists, and seminary Priests in England, who were every where skulking about at this time, especially in the North parts, as Archbishop Sandys judged it necessary to intimate to the Bishops of his province,* that they might be on their guard against them. But to leave these things for the present; the Papists were not the only persons who gave disturbance to the Bishops and Magistracy at this time; it was a very busy time with the Puritans (if it be fair to call them any longer by that name). Archbishop Grindal dying this year, was succeeded by Whitgift, Bishop of Worcester, the great opponent of Cartwright, a Prelate therefore not very likely to connive at the practices of those who set themselves against the Church and the Laws, by breach of the act of Uniformity; who pretended to be maintainers of the discipline of GOD, in opposition as it was considered to the established discipline; and were not prepared to submit to certain articles put forth by the new Archbishop and the Bishop of London, which were likely to bring many of their pastors and preachers into trouble, by requiring their subscription, as a test of conformity. The Archbishop is thought besides to have had especial instructions from the Queen, to "hold a strait rein, to press the discipline of his Church, and recover his province to Uniformity."—Collier.

It would take up too much of the reader's time, if we were to attempt to go far into the disputes on foot at this period, though Lord Burghley appears to have paid great attention to them, not only as one of the Council, but privately and individually; being evidently embarrassed, to know how to bring things to any settlement, though extremely anxious to do so if he could; for he soon discovered that, as is commonly the case, those who dissented from the Church, differed as much among themselves; and that in truth any general and universal agreement was not to be expected; he took account, in the way of private memorandums, of the opinions and doctrines of those who refused to subscribe the new Articles put forth by the Archbishop, particularly in his own diocese of Canterbury, whence it appears that the sum of their objections was as follows:

* Strype's Annals, iii. 242.

"No more holidays than Sundays ought to be—no days to be named by saints—no fast to be appointed to saints' evens—none of the Apocrypha to be read in the Church—the attire for ministers to be as it was the second of Edward the Sixth, is against the commandment of the Holy Ghost—the length of the Liturgy hindereth sermons—the book [viz. of Common Prayer] is imperfect, containing extraordinary prayers against war, famine, pestilence, &c. and containeth not prayers of thanksgiving—at the communion, the communicants, being private persons, do pray with the Minister, where the Minister only ought to pray, and the communicants only to say, Amen.—It is not well said that all children baptized are saved—the book allows to the Clergy a superiority, and establisheth not the authority of Elders—it is contrary to God's word, to order these degrees in the Church, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."—These were copied from Lord Burghley's own manuscript notes, who had also obtained a paper, entitled "Sentences and Principles of Puritans in Kent," which he thus indorsed, "These sentences following, are gathered out of certain sermons and answers in writing made by Dudley Fenner;" but we must not attempt to copy them.* They may be seen in Strype's Life of Whitgift, and for information relating to the practices of Papists this year at home and abroad, collected by Lord Burghley, or communicated to him by sundry persons, and from divers places, on the Continent, see Strype's Annals, iii. b. i. chapters xvi. xvii. "The eyes of the Queen and her friends," says the historian, "were now open, and saw well the treacherous designs of the English Papists, to overthrow her and her Government, and to place the Scots' Queen on the English throne; assistance also being expected from Spain, and other Popish countries; and how busy the seminaries were every where, drawing away the Queen's subjects to Popery." Among other artifices of the Papists, we may reckon their publication of the Rhemish Testament this year, an English translation got up at Rheims, not with any view of providing a vernacular Testament, for the use of their English fellow Christians, but in order to counteract, if possible, the effect of the other English versions. The celebrated Puritan Cartwright, applied himself to expose this insidious measure of the Seminarists, but in doing so, as might be expected, greatly favoured the

* At the end of the sentences was the following prayer, particularly aimed at Whitgift: "Ye shall pray also that God would strike through the sides of all such as go about to take away from the ministers of the gospel, the liberty which is granted them by the word of God." There is a note also of names given in baptism by Dudley Fenner, as "joy again," "from above," "more fruit," and "dust."

Geneva discipline. The errors in this translation were detected and ably pointed out by Dr. Fulk. It was, in fact, no translation of the original Greek, but of the Latin Vulgate.

The extract above, while it serves to shew what were some of the objections made to the forms of the Established Church and its Orders, may satisfy the reader of the great attention paid by the great man whose life we are writing, to every thing relating to the peace and quiet of the Church and nation.* The following passage, however, from Collier's Ecclesiastical History, deserves to be added, as admirably expressive of the difficulties of the case as they appeared to that noble Lord :—

"The Archbishop being inflexible and steady to the Constitution, some of the Courtiers made an essay upon the Dissenters. They tried to bring this party to a temper, and draw some concessions from them: that this lessening the differences, and advancing towards the Establishment, might set the Conformists more at ease, and make way for an accommodation. And here the Lord Burghley made the first proposition. This Nobleman, upon some complaint against the Liturgy, bid the Dissenters draw up another, and contrive the offices in such a manner as might give general satisfaction to their brethren. Upon this overture, the first Classis struck out their lines, and drew mostly by the portrait of Geneva. This draught was referred to the consideration of a second Classis, who made no less than 600 exceptions to it. The third Classis quarrelled the corrections of the second, and declared for a new model. The fourth refined no less upon the third. The Treasurer advised all these reviews, and different committees, on purpose to break their measures, and silence their clamours against the Church. However, since they could not come to any agreement in a form for Divine Service, he had a handsome opportunity of a release; for now they could not decently importune him any farther. To part smoothly with them, however, he assured their agents that when they came to

* One who was anxious to procure some moderate changes in the Church services and ceremonies, Withers, Rector of Danbury in Essex, thus begins a long letter addressed to Lord Burghley upon the subject: "You may justly marvel what toy hath taken me in the head to trouble you that are so greatly pressed with weight and multitude of the common affairs, with these also our ecclesiastical contentions. But the general care of the Church, which you have evidently declared to the whole world, and chiefly the importunity of friends, hath enforced me to pass my bounds, and to be too bold with your Lordship, in writing these few lines, concerning our Church controversies."

any unanimous resolve upon the matter before them, they might expect his friendship."*

It is well known that those who scrupled the habits and other ceremonies, had their friends in the Council, so that the Magistrates were sometimes at a loss how to act, while those who favoured that party in particular, were encouraged to appeal against the Bishops and the Queen's Commissioners, to the Council at large: an address of this nature was sent up from the county of Suffolk this year, where many non-conforming Ministers had been informed against, indicted, and arraigned. A few passages from this address may deserve to be copied, for the singularity of the style, and the allusion to other Non-conformists:—

"If it be lawful to speak but truth for ourselves, this is our course: we serve her Majesty and the country; not according to our fantasies, as the world falsely bears us in hand, but according to the law and statutes of England. We reverence both the law and the lawmaker. Law speaketh, and we keep silence. Law commandeth, and we obey. Without law, we know that no man can possess his own in peace. By law we proceed against all offenders. We touch none that law spareth; we spare none that law toucheth. Hinc illæ lacrymæ. We allow not of the Papists their treacherous subtleties and hypocrisies. We allow not of the Family of Love, an egg of the same nest. We allow not of the Anabaptists, nor of their community. We allow not of Browne, the overthrower of Church and Commonwealth. We abhor all these. No, we punish all these."

The following should be added, as matter of complaint, and in justice to the complainants:—

"We beg leave to advertise your Lordships, how the adversary has very cunningly christened us with an odious name, neither rightly applied, nor surely rightly understood.—It is the name of Puritanism. We detest both the name and heresy. It is a term compounded of all other heresies aforesaid. The Papist is pure and immaculate—he hath store of goodness for himself, and plenty for others. The Family† cannot sin: they be so pure, that God is hominified in them, and they deified in God. But we, thanks be to God, do cry, Peccavimus cum patribus nostris. We groan under the burden of our sins.

* Eccles. Hist. ii. 586. Lord Burghley certainly befriended many of the Non-Conformists, where they did not prevent it by their own violence or indiscretion. See an instance in the case of the celebrated Preacher, Smith, called the silver-tongued Preacher, as inferior only to Chrysostom (the golden-tongued).—Chalmers' Biog. Dict. xxviii. 115. † Of love.

We confess that there be none worse before God, and yet before the world we labour to keep ourselves and our profession unblameable; this is our Puritanism."*

In the course of this year, Lord Burghley appears to have been a good deal disgusted with the state of affairs; to have become weary of the burdensome post he held, and to have wished to lay down his office, leave the Court, and retire to a private life. Many conjectures have been formed as to the exact cause of these cares and anxieties; but, from the strange letter the Queen wrote to him, to divert him from his purposes, it would seem that he had had some affront put upon him at Court, to which he did not like to submit, and probably in the Council, by some of Leicester's party, if not by Leicester† himself, who differed

* In justice to ourselves, we would wish to observe, that, disliking all opprobrious appellations and party distinctions that involve any violation of the truth, we should, perhaps, henceforth abstain from the use of the term Puritans, but that it is a term now historically established, and need not, indeed, carry with it any such insinuation as is hinted at above. The Puritans of Queen Elizabeth's days, were those who thought the Reformation not carried far enough, and that the services of the Church would become more pure, as they became more simple, and freer from ceremonies. At all events, it was an appellation they brought upon themselves, by the very terms they used, of "sweeping the Church clean," calling their brother Protestants of Germany, the enemies of their own purer religion, and their forms and doctrines obnoxious to all the purer Churches; that is, the Calvinistic.

† "At such a distance of time," says the author of the Bibliotheca Britannica, "it may be impossible to guess what were the principal causes that made the Lord Treasurer, at this time, so very uneasy; and yet, considering the vast number of histories, annals, memoirs, and political treatises, relating to that reign, this would seem but an indifferent excuse. We will, therefore, use our endeavours to give the reader some hints of what might probably create in the Lord Treasurer a design of retiring. In the first place, the Spanish and Popish faction clamoured against him loudly, at home and abroad, representing him to be the sole author of their persecution in England; and the Puritans also were very little satisfied, because of his great regard for the Bishops, his preserving the revenues, and supporting the authority of the Church upon all occasions. In the next place, there was a strong party against him in the Queen's Council, who made false and malicious comments upon every thing he advanced or approved; which party he began now to fear, more especially as Leicester had set himself openly at their head; and, lastly, he thought the Queen herself did not sustain him in things of great importance,—sometimes affecting to suspect him of a secret friendship for, and intelligence with, the Queen of Scots; in the same manner as before she had hinted at his great affection for the Duke of Norfolk; and yet, after that Nobleman was beheaded, placed that to his account, as we shall hereafter see she did the death of the Queen of Scots." All this appears to us to be very reasonable, especially as avowed to be collected from a comparison of Camden, Hollinshed, Stowe, and the private memoirs and state papers of the reign.

with him in regard to the Netherlands. The Queen evidently wished not only to retain him, but to restore him to his wonted good humour, by turning the affair into ridicule, and so rallying him upon it, as to make it pass for a matter of no moment. We cannot say much for her Majesty's wit, as displayed in her letter, but as it still may be seen indorsed by Lord Burghley, as received by him on the 8th of May, 1583, and some have pronounced it to be a "noble testimony of her own good sense and the Treasurer's merit," it ought not (however otherwise well known) to be omitted upon this occasion; it begins, "Sir Spirit,*—I doubt I do nick-name you, for those of your kind (they say) have no sense. But I have of late seen an Ecce signum, that if an ass kick you, you feel it so soon. I will recant you from being a spirit, if ever I perceive that you disdain not such a feeling. Serve God, fear the King, and be a good fellow to the rest. Let never care appear in you for such a rumour: but let them well know, that you rather desire the righting of such wrong by making known their error, than you to be so silly a soul as to foreslow that you ought to do, or not freely deliver what you think meetest, and pass of no man so much, as not to regard her trust who putteth it in you. God bless you, and long may you last, omnino. "E. R."

That her Majesty's letter had the effect she desired, of restoring harmony where it had been interrupted, we may conclude, from her taking the opportunity immediately afterwards of visiting Theobalds, with a large retinue, and passing five days there, to the honour (as it was always esteemed, though certainly much to the cost) of those who had to receive her in such state. Amongst her attendants, on this particular occasion, were the two brothers, the Earls of Warwick and Leicester, the Lord Admiral, the Lord Howard, Lord Hunsdon, Sir Christopher Hatton, and many others; as may be seen by the allottment of the several chambers and apartments still existing, as drawn out by Lord Burghley himself, and to be found in Murdin, Nichols, &c.; a "bed-chamber in a turret," being allotted to her Majesty, with a withdrawing-chamber, presence-chamber, &c. &c.† Having had occasion to notice this visit, it may perhaps be

* See this appellation explained, or noticed, in a letter from Lord Burghley to Sir Robert Cecil, Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. b. v. No. vi.

† It was on the occasion of this visit, that her Majesty is said to have observed to the Lord Treasurer, that "His head and her purse could do any thing." It should, perhaps, have run, her purse directed by his head, for without his management, her purse would never have accomplished the things it did accomplish; it would have been closed where it should have been opened wide, well, at this time, to copy what we find in the Life, by a Domestic, as it appears in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, of her Majesty's several visits to Theobalds, and other houses of Lord Burghley. "His Lordship's extraordinary charge in entertainment of the Queen was greater to him, than to any of her subjects; for he entertained her at his house twelve several times; which cost him two or three thousand pounds every time; the Queen lying there, at his Lordship's charge, sometimes three weeks, a month, yea, six weeks together. Her Majesty sometimes had strangers and Ambassadors come to her at Theobalds; where she has been seen in as great royalty, and served as bountifully and magnificently, as at any other time or place, all at his Lordship's charge; with rich shows, pleasant devices, and all manner of sports, to the great delight of her Majesty, and her whole train, with great thanks from all who partook of them, and as great commendation from all that heard of it abroad."

He built three houses:—One in London for necessity; Cecil House, since Exeter Exchange, where the Queen "supt with him, July 14, 1560, before it was fully finished, and came by the fields from Christ Church;" and where, "July 6, 1564, her Majesty stood God-mother to his daughter Elizabeth." Another at Burghley, of competency for the mansion of his barony; and another at Waltham, [Theobalds, in the parish of Cheshunt, purchased March 5, 1570,] for his younger son, which at the first he meant for a little pile, as I have heard him say; but after he came to entertain the Queen so often there, he was enforced to enlarge it, rather for the Queen and her great train, and to set the poor in order, than for pomp or glory; for he ever said, it would be too big for the small living he could leave his son. He greatly delighted in making gardens, fountains, and walks, which, at Theobalds, were perfected most costly, beautifully, and pleasantly; where one might walk two miles in the walks before he came to their ends. When Lord Burghley fell sick, he wrote to the Queen for and if left to be opened by others, as they chose, have had its contents squandered upon unprofitable objects. How well these things were managed by Lord Burghley, may be seen in Macdiarmid's Lives of British Statesmen, where it is exceedingly well shewn, that the most trifling aids (comparatively with our own times), by his wise management, were rendered efficient; allies subsidized without impoverishing the nation; doubtful friends aided only upon good securities, and with such cautious foresight, as to prevent, as far as possible, in that deceitful age, the Queen's supplies being turned against herself. To shew that Burghley's head was necessary sometimes to keep the Queen's purse closed, the same author observes, that upon an estimate made by Lord Burghley himself, she appears to have lavished on Essex as much as three hundred thousand pounds.

leave to lay down his offices: her Majesty visited and comforted him. The servants at the chamber-door desiring her to stoop, (on account of her high head-dress,) she generously answered, 'For your master's sake I will stoop, but not for the King of Spain.'"

We shall also take the opportunity of adding what Camden has said of Theobalds in his Britannia, as containing more of its history than would otherwise fall within the scope of our undertaking, especially as it may serve to connect the times of which we are writing, with our own times, in a very remarkable manner, by the circumstance of the estate and house of Hatfield being at this time in the possession of the immediate descendant of that younger son, of whom the account above makes mention, viz., the first Earl of Salisbury, a statesman little less celebrated than his father, and his successor in two of his great offices; being, perhaps, in his time, both Secretary of State and Lord Treasurer. The following is Camden's account of Theobalds. He calls it "a place than which, as to the fabric, nothing can be more neat; and as to the gardens, walks, and wildernesses, nothing can be more pleasant. Yet Sir Robert Cecil, to whom his father left it, much improved it. When King James I. came out of Scotland to take possession of the throne of England, in April, 1603, he made a stay at this house for refreshment, on the 3d of May; and Sir Robert Cecil, the owner, gave him a noble reception, the Lords of the Privy Council attending to pay their homage. The King stayed there one night, and the next day made several Noblemen (English and Scots) of his Council, and created twenty-eight Knights. Sir Robert Cecil himself was at this time created Lord Esingdon in Rutland. This King took so great delight in this seat, that he afterwards gave the manor of Hatfield Regis in exchange for it to the Lord Cecil (Esingdon), whom he the next year created Viscount Cranburne, and the year after Earl of Salisbury. The said King often visited this his palace, enlarged the park, and inclosed it with a brick wall, ten miles in compass, and at last died there, 27th of March, 1627. In the rebellion of 1651, this noble palace was plundered, and so much defaced, that it is now become a little village of a Prince's habitation."—Britann. Antiq. But to quit this digression—

In the course of this year, 1583, a very illustrious foreigner visited England, of whom we have an account not to be disputed, in a letter from Mr. Faunt, of the Secretaries' Office, to Mr. Bacon (Lord Burghley's nephew). This eminent person was Albert Alasco Count Palatine of Sirad in Poland. "His family," says Mr. Faunt, "you shall read to be the best in his country, and of which the Kings have heretofore been most commonly elected; and for his personage, very rare, and surpassing all that I have seen of his years, which are fifty-six, or thereabouts. He hath been General in more than forty fought battles, and yet is of that lustiness and strength, that he is able to lead many more, before he be ready, in man's judgment, for the grave. He is very civil, and speaketh the Latin and Italian very well; but the Sclavonian, and other languages thereabouts, very naturally. He hath in his time greatly annoyed the Turk. He is of great revenues, and liveth here at his own charges, having refused her Majesty's offers in that behalf, who taketh great delight to talk with him, and hath already, in one week since his coming, given him her presence twice. And her Majesty meaneth this next week to carry him to Nonsuch, and some other places, where he shall be feasted and entertained according to his quality." In June, 1583, he visited the University of Oxford,* and was received there with great and peculiar honours; and from thence he went to Kenilworth.

Twenty-sixth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, began November 17, 1583.

So many things of importance seem to have pressed upon Lord Burghley this year, that it is almost incredible that any individual could have strength sufficient to sustain the burthen, or a mind capable of applying itself to so great a variety of public concerns. Strype, whom we generally follow for reasons before given, begins with the alarming power of the King of Spain, copying Camden, who describes all Italy to be at his beck—the Pope wholly addicted to him—the ablest persons both for war or peace, his pensioners—the house of Austria, and its many family branches, at his service—his wealth and strength greater than ever by the recent acquisition of Portugal and its Eastern Settlements, and in short, with the exception of the opposition sprung up in the Netherlands, more formidable to Europe than ever his father Charles V. was.

It must be very evident, that under these circumstances England had but little hope, if he should regain the Low Countries. The disturbances in that portion of his dominions, in so near neighbourhood to England, being to all appearance the only barrier against this formidable enemy of Elizabeth, of whose lively resentment and bitter malice there could be no doubt, however concealed under the usual compliments and friendly assurances of diplomatic communications; but, in truth, the very rules and regulations of diplomacy appear to have been violated in the case of Spain, by the machinations of Mendoza, the Spanish minister in England; whom it was found necessary to banish the kingdom at any hazard of offending his too potent master. The charge against him was that of fostering and encouraging treasonable practices against the Queen's person, and from which he certainly did not sufficiently clear himself, as an accredited minister of a friendly power. The Queen, however, sent a special embassy to Philip to explain the circumstances of his dismissal, and caused a declaration to be drawn up at large, for her vindication both at home and abroad. Strype has inserted a translation of it in the Appendix to the third volume of his Annals, No. xxvi., and supposes it to have been written by Lord Burghley himself; it was entitled "Declaratio eorum quæ circa Mendozæ,* Catholici Regis legati, missionem acciderunt: una cum responso et ejusdem objecta contra suam majestatem;" and it was endorsed, "A Declaration of sundry unkindnesses offered her Majesty by the King of Spain." But neither of these things had the effect of mollifying the anger of Philip. The Queen's Minister Waad, was refused an audience of the King, on his arrival in Spain, and the charges against Mendoza not entered into before the Spanish Council, to whom Waad had been referred, through a disdain of the King's neglect of him.

It is impossible for us to give a full account of the plots supposed to be on foot this year for depriving her Majesty of her crown, and setting it on the head of Mary;† we say, supposed to be on foot, because suspicions have been

* To shew how dangerous a man Mendoza was esteemed to be, Sir Edward Stafford, the English Minister at Paris, wrote home, that on his (Mendoza's) arrival in France, the Queen Mother there "stormed marvellously, and told the King the dangerous disposition of the man, and both of them would fain be rid of him if they could."

† The following is Strype's account: "The Popish party were very busy hereunto this year; and now more and more. Many Englishmen of that religion became bigots, and were employed in plots for the deliverance of the Scots' Queen, though it were with the assassination of their natural Queen Elizabeth: actuated and encouraged by foreign Princes too. Such were Throgmorton, Lord Paget, his brother Charles, under the name of Mope, Lord Arundel, and among entertained of very foul practices in the detection of such plots, and insinuations thrown out against the evidence adduced in proof of several of them; but, it is not we think possible to doubt, as many historians have confessed, of a general design to that effect, amongst the Catholic powers of Europe, particularly the King of Spain, the Pope, and the Leaguers in France, having the Duke of Guise at their head, and which led to that memorable association for the protection of Elizabeth, which Mary is said to have regarded as her death-warrant.

It may be expected that Mary will always be forgiven for any devices she could form, for escaping the trammels into which she had most unfortunately fallen, but it does not follow from thence, that there was any thing very wrong in the association to preserve Elizabeth, and which is said to have been brought about by Leicester's means;* a suspicious agent no doubt, but no bad judge, probably, of the dangers to be apprehended. Elizabeth's enemies were, at all times, numerous, powerful, and in their resentments, as we verily believe, quite unappeasable. Those resentments seemed now to be getting to a head, and no wonder that it should be so; to the alarm of both Queens. The greater wonder perhaps is, that Elizabeth could have been protected so long, or her miserable captive not wrested out of her hands by a force much superior to any she could raise, in the many years that had now passed of Mary's restraint and thraldom. In the mean while, England had been constantly improving in strength and wealth, and Elizabeth had always so confidently expressed her reliance on the attachment and support of her subjects, that it is certainly to the credit of the latter, that they stood forth, upon this occasion, to prevent her and her kingdom the rest the false Welshman, Parry; and besides a great many priests and seminaries had been discovered and taken up, and remained now in divers prisons. Whom yet the Queen would not put to death (as many had been already for examples), but now chose rather to rid the land of them and banish them. De Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador here, was a great and busy instrument in these mischievous designs, so he was discharged and sent away; but remained in France, following his practices there against England."

* Camden, Rapin, &c.—See also Paget's letter to the Queen of Scots, Murdin, 436. In this letter Paget affirms that Leicester had told a friend of his, that he was resolved to be avenged of Mary, for that he knew she had been privy to the book that had been set forth against him. Though Leicester, however, might be the author of this association, it does not follow that it was the less necessary as a public security to Elizabeth. "Surely," says Bishop Carleton, in his curious little book, the Christian Remembrancer, "this association was useful, and held many in order."

being overwhelmed by the power of Spain; and, in fact, to keep the crown upon her head, in opposition to the designs that were, undoubtedly, on foot, to wrest it from her.

The two Queens themselves, however, in this extraordinary and threatening posture of affairs, seemed willing to make another experiment at negotiation. Elizabeth has even the credit given her, of being, upon this occasion, sincere in wishing Mary to be set at liberty.* But those who looked more narrowly into the probable, or at least possible, consequences of such a revolution in the state of affairs, could not be brought to concur in thinking it expedient. Elizabeth's Ministers could not be satisfied as to the securities proposed, and the Protestants in Scotland could not be brought to see in the admission of Mary to any participation in the Government of their country, any thing less than the conversion of the King and the utter overthrow of their religion. It may, indeed, be collected from the letters sent to Mary, from abroad, that the overthrow of every thing that had been done either in England or Scotland, towards the Reformation, was in contemplation, if Mary could be set at liberty; thus Paget wrote to her, suggesting a plan for her escape, at the end of this year; "knowing," as he tells her, "that the only part of good to come to the state of England and Scotland, is to be by your mean;" i. e. by making her Queen of both countries, and bringing her son over to the Catholic religion.—See his letter in Murdin, p. 438.

It has been insinuated that the English Ministry, in order to find a pretence for detaining Mary, even at this time, had procured the Clergy of Scotland and King's party, to raise all possible objections to her return. We really think there was no occasion for this; we consider it to have been the duty of Elizabeth's Ministers to weigh well the securities propounded, and if they could not in conscience believe them to be such as might, with perfect safety, be accepted, to prevent Elizabeth, at so momentous a period, acceding to the proposals on Mary's part. And we do also verily believe, that the clergy of Scotland were sufficiently aware, without any excitement, that the Kirk would have been shaken to its foundation, had Mary returned, while the King was half converted,† and rendered suspicious of England. The disturbance in both countries was very great, and the crisis awful. But we must still say, and we cannot avoid it, that if all public confidence were shaken, it was the work of the Papists.

† As to what was going on in regard to the conversion of James, at this time, the letters in Murdin, from Paget and Morgan at Paris, should be carefully examined. See under the years 1584, 1585, 1586; where may also be found the course of communication managed, principally through the means of Morgan, between Mary and her adherents; and which appears very extraordinary.

Sir Edward Stafford, writing from Paris at this time, says, in a letter to Secretary Walsingham, "I dare not warrant any thing, the world being now-a-days so full of deceit."—Could any thing possibly be more atrocious, than Philip's proscription of the Prince of Orange, with the deliberate offer of a reward of 25,000 ducats, to whomsoever should kill him. Could the Ministers of Elizabeth be expected to be careless of securities for her person, when in the month of July of this very year, that Prince was actually shot in his own hall, the assassin having previously confessed himself to a Jesuit Priest of Treves, and discovered to him his desperate and wretched design ?* The Prince was aware of his danger, though he could not sufficiently guard against it, but it is remarkable,

The ciphers found in the possession of Mary, are still to be seen in the State Paper Office, being many in number. Some of Lord Shrewsbury's servants appear to have betrayed their trust, but we have the authority of Sir Ralph Sadler, for the fact, that even at Tutbury, it was impossible to prevent an intercourse being clandestinely carried on, between Mary and her agents and friends in France.—See his state papers, 1584, 1585. His letters, for the short time he was at Tutbury, are certainly very curious. He had his hawks and his falconers there, and Mary partook of the sport; "sometyme a myle, sometyme ii myles, but not past iii myles from the castell;" as he wrote to the Secretary. But in this, he was judged to have run too great a risk. The case, however, had been exaggerated; Elizabeth had been informed, that they went to the extent of six or seven miles from the castle.

The Prince was murdered in the presence of the Princess, whose first husband, and father, the Admiral Coligni, had fallen amongst the victims of the Parisian massacre.—Voltaire. We may perhaps add another royal victim to Protestantism, in the case of Philip's own son Don Carlos. A French avocat, Lewis d'Orleans, in a work published in 1588, and intituled, Reponse des vrais Catholiques Francois à l' avertissement des Catholiques Anglois, asserts, that Philip's eldest son was put to death for heresy. Of the sentiments avowed by this Romish Lawyer, and of his denunciations of Elizabeth, as a bastard, an usurper, a Jezebel, a heretic (and as such, worse and more detestable than a Turk, Pagan, Jew, or infidel), finally, as an excommunicated, and thereby deposed Princess, Mr. Turner has given a curious account in his reign of Elizabeth, b. ii. ch. xxxi.

that among the preparations he made for his expected death, one was to recommend his daughters to the care of Elizabeth, who, when the horrid event of his assassination had taken place, did not neglect them, but was careful to recommend them, by a letter to their near relative the Duc de Monpensier, to the superintendence and guardianship of different Ladies of high distinction and respectability on the Continent, taking to her own charge, the one to whom she had been godmother.

The beginning of this letter, still extant, may very well serve to shew the jeopardy in which the Protestant Princes of Europe stood with regard to the hidden, concealed, or disguised practices of the Papists.*

"Monsieur mon Cousin,—Comme le feu Prince d'Orange, prevoyant le danger imminent, auquel il etoit toujours subject par les secretes menées et embusches que lui tendoient ses enemys, nous eust de son vivant, &c!"

The secret designs here spoken of, were actually accomplished, consummated, and brought to an issue. Here, therefore, there could be no possible doubt of the evil purposes, wicked intentions, and deliberate malice of the Papists. We may call it religious infatuation, fanaticism, or what we please, but the effect was the same.—Elizabeth was, from the first moment of her accession to the English throne, a person proscribed by the Pope, and Popish Courts. The Prince of Orange also incurred the same proscription, and fell in the course of this very year by the hand of an assassin. Was not this a pretty fair warning to Elizabeth, and one likely to increase rather than relax the vigilance of her Ministers, and attached subjects? The Admiral Coligni had also been proscribed by the Catholic powers and horribly murdered. Surely it will be confessed, this was a strange time to offer Catholic securities to Elizabeth? and what had Mary to offer but Catholic securities, and her own word and promise, which according to the very lesson she might have been taught by her mother, were not, in any case of emergency, affecting the See of Rome, to be kept with heretics?

Bishop Carleton, alluding to the confessions of Hart about this time, says,

* Sir Edward Stafford, in a letter to the Court from Paris, July 22, 1584, writes, "Don Antonio sent to speak to me the last day in great haste: where declaring the affection he had to her Majesty, he disclosed to me a very certain advertisement he had from a very good place, and besides out of the Spanish agent's house, that the same practice that hath been executed upon the Prince of Orange, there are practisers more than two or three about to execute upon her Majesty, and some other, and especially her Majesty, and that to be done within these two months."

"We find by these things that France and Spain and the strength of the Pope were here all combined against the Queen Elizabeth and King James, for no other cause but for their religion, because Queen Elizabeth and King James had established the same religion. Against which religion all the great powers of the world were combined.—If a man shall consider the counsels, the policies, the strength of these great powers which were set against these two Princes, it is a matter to be wondered at, how they should stand against so deep and desperate dangers. Here I wish that a Papist of any understanding would take this matter into his consideration, and look but a little farther to the end and event of things, what man purposed, what God wrought? i. e. in the preservation of both Elizabeth and James, and the union of the two crowns in the person of the latter." As this Protestant Bishop, when he wrote, was living under the government of James, we must surely conclude, that his representation of the Popish Confederacy, including the Great Plot to which Mary alluded, was no exaggeration, and that in truth, Elizabeth, as well as James, stood in the situation of regularly proscribed victims, had things taken a different turn.

But it is time to enter a little more into the detail of the events of this busy year.—If we follow Strype, it would appear that the first care of Lord Burghley was, to look to the affairs of the Netherlands; to Don Antonio, the pretender to the throne of Portugal; and to any others who had distinct quarrels with Spain, and to afford them such assistance as might give occupation to Philip, without an absolute breach of peace. The information given to Lord Burghley upon these heads by Hawkins, Treasurer of the Admiralty, may be seen in the Annals, vol. iii. ch. xviii. Proposals were made to the Queen a second time by the States of Holland, to be taken under her Majesty's protection, in preference to the King of France, who had laboured to be accepted as their Lord in general;* and at length this proposal was acceded to.

Among the correspondents which Lord Burghley had at this time may be reckoned Henry the Great, as he was afterwards called, at this time only King of Navarre. His Majesty had a hard task to defend himself, and his small kingdom, and the religion, as the Profession of Faith among the Hugonots was called, against the Leaguers, the Duke of Guise and his party; and he had often occasion, therefore, to address himself to Lord Burghley, as the Queen's principal Minister. Many of his letters had passed unanswered, Lord Burghley's excuse being, that he judged it presumptuous to write to his Majesty, where no answer was strictly needful; but a servant of that King being now about to depart from England to his Master, Lord Burghley was induced to write as follows:

"Sir, I have received sundry letters of your Majesty divers times; wherein I confess myself greatly beholden unto your Majesty for your good opinion expressed therein, of me and my actions for the cause of the Gospel, more largely than my power can deserve, though my will, according to my bounden duty, is not less than your Majesty is pleased to express. And though I have not used to write to your Majesty again in answer of your Majesty's letters (which I have foreborne, as judging it some kind of presumption to trouble your Majesty with my writings, where my answer was not needful), yet at this time, the tender of a Gentleman of Scotland, named Mr. Weemes, now belonging unto your Majesty, hath very earnestly required me, for his discharge, to certify you, that he brought to me your letters, which in truth he did; and being a Gentleman worthy of great commendation, I could not deny him so reasonable a request; which is the cause of my present writing, praying your Majesty to accept the same, as from an humble devoted servitor of your Majesty, not so much for your kingdom, which I do honour greatly, but for your magnanimity and constancy in the true religion of Christ, wherein I pray God to assist you with his graces, to the confusion of Antichrist, and of his members."

The Prince Palatine and his brother Duke Casimir came this year to England, and received the greatest attentions from the Queen and her great Counsellor the Lord Treasurer, which, after their return, was gratefully acknowledged, in a letter to his Lordship from Wierus, who has been mentioned before.

We have already observed that both Queens, being under some alarm at the threatening aspect of affairs, Elizabeth at the great confederacy of foreign powers against her, and Mary at the association formed to take extraordinary care of that Queen's and the kingdom's welfare, had opened some fresh communication tending to an amicable adjustment of subsisting differences.

With regard to the Association itself, Rapin says, "It was impossible not to see that the Queen of Scots was directly aimed at, for whose sake all the plots on foot were contriving. Wherefore, very probably, from this time her death began to be determined; the two Queens being no longer able to subsist together. The Council of England at least was of this opinion. Mary doubted not that the law was enacted against her. Perhaps she would have prevented the fatal effects of it, could she have renounced all correspondence in the kingdom, and in foreign countries. But she had not the prudence to take this wise course, or perhaps to avoid the snares laid for her; or was not quick-sighted enough to perceive, that she only served for a blind to her pretended friends to execute other projects." Mary, however, wrote to Lord Burghley in the following terms, requesting him to favour her cause with the Queen, and to assist M. Mauvisier, the French Ambassador, in pursuit of the same object.

"Monsieur, le grand Thesaurier.—Ayant écrit ses jours passées à la royne, ma dame, ma bonne sœur, pour lui ramantenoir la sincerité de mon intention vers elle, et la grand necessité que j'ay de son octroy en mes requestes passées; je pançois par mesme moyen vous faire ce mot pour vous prier me y etre favourable en son endroit, en tant que selon son service, et ma commodité, elle pouroit me favouriser, et d'avantage obliger à elle. Mais me trouvant un peu mal, et laschée de ma depesche je fus contreinte de la remettre jusques à present, ayant prié eependant le sieur Mauvésiere ambassadeur du roy tres Chrestien, Monsieur mon bon frere, de vous communiquer le tout, et impetrer votre ayde et support vers la ditte dame, ma bonne sœur. En quoy m'assurant qu'il n'aura manquer, ne vous troubleray de plus long discours, si non vous prier d'avoir, esguard à ma longue captivité, et à la verité de tout ce que l'on à voulu me mettre à subs. et si je ne suis privée de tout sense ce que je puis pretendre pour mon meilleur, et de ce que j'ai le plus cher voiant l'estat où je suis, et à l'heure je m'assure tant de votre sagesse, que vous jugeray aisement, que je ne tands a meriter d'estre tant soupsonnée, et en cet endroit je finiray, par mes recommendations à votre bonne grace, et de celle de ma dame de Burley votre femme: priant Dieu vous donner à tout deux le contentement que desirez. De Shefield, ce xx de Novembre. Votre entierement bonne amye,

"Marie R.*"

How much it were to be wished that such a letter could have had its full and desired effect, and that the dreadful catastrophe to which we are now fast approaching could have been avoided, and the pages of our history not stained with so foul a blot. But we must proceed; and, as we have before observed, * Strype's Annals, iii. Appendix, No. xxxviii.

what we cannot excuse, endeavour to account for. "This year," says Strype, "an earnest treaty was in hand betwixt the Queen of Scots and Queen Elizabeth, for her liberty; the said Queen Mary professing to enter into a strict amity; and Queen Elizabeth being inclinable to release her. But the wise men about her knew there could be no security in such an act." On this, then, we may believe (for circumstances seem to prove it), the whole question at this time turned. Security for Elizabeth, and security for the independence of the kingdom in church and state, was, we may be sure, the chief consideration with Lord Burghley; and he could not bring his mind to believe that it was attainable in the way sought. It is much to be lamented, certainly; but it may serve to relieve him from the charge of wanton and premeditated cruelty. He probably saw too far into the consequences of things to be able to determine on the side of mercy. If we should be asked why, we should deliberately say, Because Mary was too closely connected with the Catholics, to be upon any terms of sincere friendship with Elizabeth, and because, whatever number of worthy individuals there might be among the Catholics at this time, as well as at all other times, the Popes had managed to destroy all confidence in public characters, whether Princes, Ministers, the Clergy, or the laity.* The dispensations of the Court of Rome had enabled the greatest potentates in Europe to break their promises, violate their oaths, free themselves at once from the obligations of the most solemn compacts and treaties, and to dissemble to the utmost limits of deception, nay even perjury, to uphold the authority of the See of Rome, and the cause of Catholicism against heresy. We appeal to history for our proofs, as to these charges against the Head of the Church, and his ecclesiastical army of Jesuits; we appeal to their own authors, their own avowed maxims and principles; to the conduct of assassins acting upon these maxims and principles, in a variety of instances during

* Mr. Turner, in his history of Elizabeth's reign, published since the above was actually prepared for the press, has very well shewn that it was the influence of the Popish Clergy that was to be dreaded. The laity would have been more quiet, and had even proved themselves to be so, for many years, so as to give offence at Rome by their supineness, and provoke the Pope to dissolve at once the pretended bond of allegiance which connected them with a heretic; but for this authoritative reproach and interference, the loyalty of the Popish laity, and the submission of various well-disposed individuals, might, and probably would, have been trusted and confided in by the Government, but the Pope, it was known, could cancel or disturb at once all such good principles by his anathemas and ecclesiastical censures; and many indeed confessed that they were so wrought upon.

the long reign of Elizabeth ;* one case of that nature, if not more, belonging to this very year, as we have shewn in the murder of the Prince of Orange; which case, indeed, is a remarkable proof of the reality of the dangers impending over Elizabeth, in the estimation of her Ministers, had they not kept a wary eye upon the Pope's emissaries. Elizabeth was preserved; and therefore it is asserted by those of the contrary party, that she was never in danger, and that the persons executed as the Pope's agents, had no treasonable designs in their heads, that their own denial of such designs should have been implicitly believed, and deserves to be so to this day; but there is a paper extant upon this head, which, in our own estimation, sets the matter in so full a light, that though it be too long to transcribe, and might perhaps be better read in Strype, where it may be seen, some passages appear so fully to justify the suspicions upon which Elizabeth's Ministers acted, that they ought to find a place in a work purporting to treat of Lord Burghley's administration. The object of the paper was to shew, "That such Papists as of late times had been executed, were, by a statute of Edward III., lawfully executed as traitors."

The statute of Edward III. saith, "That if any man shall compass or imagine the King's death, or shall levy war against him, or shall probably be attainted to have been an adherent to the King's enemies, he shall be adjudged a traitor."

Now, let us consider the Papists' dealings. Pius V., (the father in his time of them all) calleth her Majesty's interest in the crown prætensum jus; he declareth her deprived, by his authority, of the kingdom; he absolveth her natural subjects from their oath of obedience; he curseth all that yield her any princely duty. And yet, not herewith content, before the Bull was generally published, he sent one of his ministers into this land, to signify, apostolica auctoritate certis viris illustribus, what was done at Rome; how Elizabeth was a heretic; that she had lost her crown; and that they did owe her no kind of obedience. Whereupon the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, with sundry other gentlemen, persuaded by Morton, the Pope's principal agent, Catholicos omnes summis viribus illis affuturos esse; [i. e. that all Catholics would assist them with their chiefest strength] they took up arms, and sought by force to have subdued her Majesty. And Sanders yieldeth this reason of their ill success therein, quia Catholici omnes nondum probe cognoverunt Elizabetham hæreticam esse declarandam [i. e. because all the Catholics did not yet well know that Elizabeth was to be declared a heretic]; but for the attempt, saith he, howsoever it fell out, tamen laudanda illorum nobilium consilia erant; [i. e. nevertheless the counsels of those Noblemen were to be commended.]

Now, as Morton and his companion, by the Pope's apostolic authority, wrought in England, so did Sanders, by the same authority with his Holiness' soldiers, as you all know, work in Ireland, &c.; whereby I trust that the matter is evident, that the Pope is the Queen's enemy; and that by the statute of Edward III., Morton, Sanders, and all their fellows, were rebellious traitors.

But to proceed and come nearer my purpose. These rebellions repressed, and greater regard being had of the Pope's seditious fire-brand, another course was taken, no less mischievous and dangerous than the first. When they could not devour like lions, now for a time they must play the foxes. Sanders, Morton, and their adherents, professed themselves, as you have heard, her Majesty's enemies; and hoping of a sufficient number to have vanquished her, moved her subjects to open rebellion. But now the Jesuits and seminary Priests, which of late years came over, had learned a new lesson.

They all confessed, indeed, and that stoutly, that their coming over was to increase the number of Catholics (as they term them), the Pope's retinue and subjects; and that they had employed their endeavour, by masses, confessions, reconciliations, and relics, for that purpose. For her Majesty, they said they honoured her, and she was their sovereign, their lady, and they her subjects. You hear now here a sudden alteration.

"Fistula dulce canit volucrem dum decipit auceps."

In fact, it was proved that they had special license to hold out all these fair pretences, notwithstanding the Pope's Bull, rebus sic stantibus, or donec publice ejusdem Bullæ executio fieri potest; i. e. until the execution of the said Bull could be done publicly.

This was the rod constantly held over Elizabeth and her Protestant adherents, had they but been allowed an opportunity of putting their threats in execution. But the whole paper should be read to justify its conclusion, which is as follows: "So that if ever Prince in Christendom had cause given of severity and care of guard, it is her Majesty."—Strype's Annals, iii. Appendix, No. xlvii.

Can we wonder that the "wise men about Elizabeth" should distrust all proffered securities at such a period, and between parties not less opposed to each other than the Court of Rome itself to heresy; or, in other words, to Protestantism. The writers of romance have transformed this true history of political competitions into a mere detail of female jealousies, female rivalry, petty resentments, and wanton cruelty; but it was a competition between two crowns, two kingdoms, two religions; or rather, between one crown, one kingdom, and one particular church, opposed to many crowns, [with the Tiara at their head,] many kingdoms, and, by pretension, the church universal. This was the contest most in the view of Lord Burghley, we shall venture to say, whenever, as one of Elizabeth's "wise men," he was compelled to give counsel against Mary. It was not against a miserable female captive, but against the cause and the adherents of the Queen of Scots, that he delivered his opinion. It was not, we verily believe, congenial to his nature to oppress the innocent; but he had a Sovereign to protect, per fas, and we are almost inclined to add, per nefas, for so it seemed to turn out. That is, to avert the nefarious designs of others against the proscribed and insulted Sovereign he had to preserve, for it was also at this very time that books were published and circulated, denouncing Elizabeth as the Jezebel of the age, and urging her own maids of honour to serve her in the same manner as Judith did Holofernes, and render themselves, by such an action, worthy of the applause of the church throughout all future ages.*

We must refer to Strype for another passage, touching the plots on foot this year, as bearing also on the negotiations between the two Queens: after speaking of the non-conformists among the Puritans—"The Popish faction," says he, "the other enemy to the Church, were now playing their game, for the dispossessing the Queen of her throne, and for the rescuing Mary, Queen of Scots, and to set her in Queen Elizabeth's place, if they could; for the compassing of which purposes, were combined together, the Pope, the Guises in France, and Philip King of Spain (which was called the holy league), and the said Queen of Scots holding a correspondence with them; which was discovered by letters seized, for letters passed between Sir Francis Englefield, a pensioner in Spain, and her; viz. of him to her, and her to him. There were, at this very time, letters between that Queen and the Queen's Majesty, but what thoughts she (Mary) had of any good success of it, with other matters by her letters to that fugitive Gentleman, may appear.—A copy of which was indorsed thus, by the Lord Treasurer's own hand; viz. The Queen of Scots to Sir Francis Englefield, October 9, 1584, and seems to be copied from the cipher.

* Rapin.—Life and Reign of Queen Elizabeth, vol. ii. 62.—Camden; and see the account of the very books, written by Martin of St. John's College, Oxford, a contemporary of Campian.—Strype's Annals, iii. p. 407.

"Of the treaty between the Queen of England and me, I may neither hope nor look for good issue; whatsoever shall come of me, by whatsoever change of my state and condition, let the execution of the great Plot go forward, without any respect of peril or danger to me.

"And further, I pray you, use all possible diligence and endeavour to pursue, and promote, at the other King's hand, such a speedy execution of their former designments, that the same may be effectuated some time this next spring, which is the longest time the same can be expected; and failing then, it cannot be avoided or prevented but that we shall see forthwith an extreme and general overthrow of our whole cause, never again to be repaired and set afoot in our days.

"Of the 12000 ducats, long since promised to myself, I have yet received no penny; nor my son, but 6000, of 10000 promised unto him; wherewith he is not a little grieved and discontent, and yet, as well inclined to our designment as before; and in the rest of his doings and proceedings to direct his course as I will advise him; he is now dispatching a Gentleman of his, called Gray, to the Court of England, chiefly to have occasion to visit me, and by mouth to impart unto me his resolution in all our affairs; the Gentleman is Catholic, God grant he may be permitted to come to me; solicit with all diligence, that the 12000 ducats for myself be sent with all speed. October 9, 1584."

The letters of Sir Francis Englefield, to the Courts of Spain and Rome, intercepted at the same time, contain some very noticeable passages, and particularly the one in which, alluding to the newly formed association, and Mary's being removed from the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury* to that of Sir Amias

* Of the disagreements in the Shrewsbury family at this time, much is to be found in Lodge, &c. It would take us too much out of our way to enter into the particulars, especially as we are not prepared to decide upon the different accounts to be found in books, of the strange behaviour of Lady Shrewsbury; some referring her conduct to an actual jealousy of Lord Shrewsbury's intimacy with Mary, others to a mischievous design of ruining Mary, and acting as Elizabeth's spy. Of the scandal raised against Lord Shrewsbury of an improper intercourse with his unfortunate prisoner, see Strype's Annals, iii., under the year 1584.; Collins's Peerage, ii. 56; Lodge, ii. 296. and Lingard, vol. v. 655. note (x). Lady Shrewsbury and her sons were said to

Paulet, and repeating the above letter of Mary, he writes, "It is by these doings very probable, and in effect manifest to such as have had experience of the English Government, that the Queen and Council of England have made a secret resolution, not only to deprive and disinherit the said Queen of Scotland, but also to ruin and take away her life, if the Pope and the King of Spain shall not, within the time prescribed, find some means either to deliver her, or at least so to occupy and molest the Queen of England, that she shall conceive and find, as hitherto she hath done till of late, that the life and safety of the Queen of Scots is and hath been her own principal security and assurance."*

This letter also touches upon the King of Spain's title to the crown of England, being accounted next to that of Mary by the Catholics, and urging him therefore not to incur the blame of suffering her to perish, in order to make the way more plain and open to his claim and interest.

The extraordinary circumstance in all this business, is the clandestine correspondence, constantly carrying on, notwithstanding the extreme vigilance of Elizabeth's Ministers, by those who were plotting her ruin; and though Sir Francis seems to intimate, that the safest way for Elizabeth was to save Mary, yet the great plot discovered to be on foot, must have been more likely to accelerate her end, as evidently removing the greatest obstacle to Elizabeth's quiet continuance on the throne. Many of Elizabeth's own subjects, probably, who might have been desirous of Mary's rule, being wholly set against that of Philip, as Elizabeth seems to have found in the memorable year 1588, as we shall have occasion to shew.

Towards the close of the year, and after the beginning of the 27th year of her Majesty's reign, viz. Nov. 23, a sessions of Parliament began, which lasted, allowing for one adjournment at Christmas time,† four months, from the 23d of Nov. 1584, to the 29th of March 1585. At its commencement, by the special care of have countenanced, if not propagated the scandal; but, upon an application from Mary to Elizabeth, to have the Countess compelled to give her reasons for making such a charge, she was put to her oath, and totally denied it, as well as her sons. Dr. Lingard attributes the scandal to Topcliffe, the noted persecutor of the Catholics; but in Fleetwood's report to Lord Burghley, the principal culprits are represented to have been one Walmesley, an inn-holder at Islington, and Dr. Meredith Hanmer. Lord Burghley appears to have been very anxious to clear his friend Lord Shrewsbury from the imputations cast on him.

* This letter was dated Jan. 8, 1585.

† This adjournment by a Commission from the Queen, having something singular in it, is noticed by D'Ewes, p. 318.

Lord Burghley, some good regulations were made for the reading of Bills, according to ancient usage, and which may be seen exemplified in D'Ewes' Journal.* This Parliament was much taken up by affairs of religion, complaints being made to it of the great want of able pastors, and very particularly in a supplication, supposed to have been drawn up by Sampson, late Dean of Christ Church, a preacher under King Edward VI., and therefore well known to Lord Burghley, with whom he still corresponded.† We have before shewn how difficult it was at this time to procure proper pastors for all the churches of the kingdom; the changes of late years had been so great, that in consequence of the ejection of Popish incumbents and ministers, the alienation of much of the church property, and corruption of patrons following thereupon, cures were ill provided for, and learned ministers not easily to be found.‡ This gave great scope to the non-conforming Ministers, to ingratiate themselves with the people, and to resist the interference of the Bishops. One of their main complaints being, that for want of preaching Ministers, the people were obliged to put up with those who could only "read out of a printed book," being destitute of "the gift of teaching;" but it ought to be observed, that to supply the want of "a gift of preaching," which might turn out to be a very precarious and questionable qualification,§ those who were contemned by the puritanical party

* It is rather curious to see in this Journal, how many proxies were sent to the Earl of Leicester; a courtly compliment probably, and no more: but the following letter of that great Earl, to the burgesses of Andover, is still more extraordinary.—"After my hearty commendations, Whereas, it hath pleased her Majesty to appoint a Parliament to be presently called; being Steward of your town, I make bold heartily to pray you that you would give me the nomination of one of your Burgesses for the same; and if, minding to avoid the charges of allowance for the other Burgess, you mean to name any that is not of your town, if you will bestow the nomination of the other Burgess also upon me, I will thank you for it, and will both appoint a sufficient man, and see you discharged of all charges in that behalf. If you will send me your Election with a blank, I will put in the names. From the Court, October 12, 1584.

"Your loving Friend, "R. Leycester."

† In the preceding year, as well as the present, he appears to have very particularly submitted to the judgment of Lord Burghley, the grounds of the petition he wished to have presented to Parliament.—See Strype's Life of Whitgift, b. iii. ch. x.

‡ A learned writer, alluding to those hindrances and impediments to the general supply of able and sufficient pastors, says, "For unless they should suddenly have come from heaven, or been raised up miraculously, they could not have been."

§ Lord Bacon, in his Essay on Church Controversies, speaks very reasonably of the stress laid upon preaching by the Puritans; "They have made it," says he, "in a manner of the Essence of as simple readers, were exceeding well supplied with doctrine, through those very printed books so lightly spoken of, as the Homilies, and even Calvin's Institutions, &c.: but above all, perhaps, the Decads of Bullinger, the chief minister of Zurich in Switzerland, which, being translated into English, came out this very year, for the express use of the unlearned pastors of the Church, the editor in his preface observing, that "it could not be denied, but that a homily or sermon, penned by some excellent clerk, being read plainly, orderly, and distinctly, did much move the hearers; teach, confirm, confute, comfort, &c. even as the same pronounced without book."* A learned ministry was unquestionably desirable, and the Bishops were generally exerting themselves to procure such as soon as it might be done; nor should it be overlooked, that if any of the puritanical pastors were removed from their charges, it was not in depreciation of their learning, or upon any question of their godliness, much less through any disregard of the spiritual wants of their congregations, but in consequence of the confusion arising from their non-compliance with the laws, and their well-known desire of introducing their own platform, if they could, to the superseding the discipline established.† The papers to which we have alluded, may be seen in the the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, to have a sermon precedent; they have, in a sort, annihilated the use of liturgies and forms of divine service, although the house of God be denominated of the principal, Domus Orationis, a house of prayer, and not a house of preaching. In the meantime, what preaching is, and who may be said to preach, they move no question; but as far as I see, every man that presumeth to speak in chair, is accounted a preacher."—"Let them take heed that it be not true which one of their adversaries said, 'That they have but two small wants—knowledge and love.'" He is not less severe upon their high pretensions to zeal, conscience, sincerity, and reformation; observing, that there are as well schismatical fashions as opinions, tam sunt mores schismatici, quam dogmata schismatica, "be a man endued with great virtues and fruitful in good works," says he, "yet if he concur not with them, they term him, in derogation, a civil and moral man, and compare him to Socrates or some heathen philosopher: whereas the wisdom of the Scriptures teacheth us otherwise; namely, to judge and denominate men religious according to their works of the second table, because they of the first are often counterfeit, and practised in hypocrisy." He notices also their groundless objections to King Edward's reformation.

* This Preface is of great importance, and should be read by all persons desirous of understanding the precise state of the Church at this period.

† See as to the book "De Disciplina Ecclesiastica," supposed to be written by Travers, the great antagonist of Hooker.—Strype's Life of Whitgift, b. iii. ch. ix. 1584. This was the ground and model of the Puritan discipline, so laboured to take place in the Church, in the room of Episcopacy by law established.

The Bishops, in what they did, had often to contend with the Council, in which the Puritans, as has often before been observed, had many friends. It may be seen in Strype's Life of Aylmer,

Appendix to Strype's third vol. of his Annals, Nos. xxxix. xl.; the former containing the original thirty-four articles of complaint, the latter, the same reduced in the Commons to sixteen in number, with answers by the Bishops to the several articles propounded. Sir Francis Knollys, Treasurer of the Queen's Household, seems to have been the chief mover, or promoter, of the business in the House of Commons, Sir Christopher Hatton taking the contrary side; but that that prelate had two cases before him this year, in which the Council interposed. In one case, the Bishop stood firm; in the other, believing he had been mis-informed, the deposed Minister was restored; but the Bishop, to escape the censures of the Council in the former case, wrote to Lord Burghley, to "interpose a seasonable word for him, as he knew he would do, in all matters of justice and equity."—Life of Aylmer, ch. vii. The Lord Treasurer's situation, as the referee of all parties, was a very distressing one, especially after Whitgift became Archbishop, who felt himself bound, in obligation to the Queen, to exert himself in defence of the laws, and thereby in defiance of some of her great Courtiers; as in particular, Lord Leicester and Sir Francis Knollys. Thus he wrote to Lord Burghley, that "his conscience bore him witness, that he did nothing which in duty he ought not to do—that the laws were with him, whatsoever Mr. Treasurer (Sir Francis Knollys), and some lawyers (whose skill he said was not great), said to the contrary. That her Majesty moved and earnestly exhorted him thereto, with strict charge, as he would answer the contrary. And yet, nevertheless, some others (said he), who must seem to rule and overrule all, must have their wills." Lord Burghley, however, was certainly among those who thought this Archbishop was rather too rigid, exacting too much in the way of subscription, though, as he wrote the Archbishop word, even with regard to those for whom he was inclined to plead, "he had strongly admonished them, that if they were disturbers in their churches, they must be corrected." Of the Lord Treasurer's embarrassment, the following passage from one of his letters to the Archbishop, is certainly strong to the purpose; it is dated July 1, 1584. "I am sorry to trouble your Grace so often as I do; but I am more troubled myself, not only with many private petitions of sundry Ministers recommended from persons of credit, for peaceable persons in their ministry; and yet, by complaints to your Grace, and other your colleagues in commission, greatly troubled; but also I am now daily charged by counsellors and public persons, to neglect my duty, in not staying of these your Grace's proceedings, so vehement and so general against Ministers and Preachers; as the Papists are thereby generally encouraged, all ill-disposed subjects animated, and thereby the Queen's Majesty's safety endangered. With those kind of arguments I am daily assailed, against which I answer, that I think your Grace doth nothing, but being duly examined, tendeth to the maintenance of the religion established, and to avoid schism in the Church." But for the Lord Treasurer's remonstrances, and the Archbishop's replies, we must refer to Strype's Life of that Prelate, book iii. ch. vii. viii., &c. with the letters and papers in the Appendix there referred to, and from which we think it will appear, that though Lord Burghley occasionally took the part of the recusants, the Archbishop never lost his confidence in him as a sure friend to the established order of things. In this part of his work, Strype will be found to correct Fuller.

the best account of the whole of these proceedings, as affecting the Church, is to be found in Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, who corrects Fuller, and supplies what is wanting in D'Ewes—particularly the speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury himself, which seems to have been no otherwise reported, than in the heads of it, communicated afterwards by his Grace himself to Lord Burghley, among whose papers it was found. The speech of Archbishop Sandys, also, is well reported by Strype, but may be likewise seen in D'Ewes's Journal, not among the proceedings of the House of Lords, but of the Commons, p. 359, where the Lord Burghley is represented to have answered generally, "that the Lords did conceive many of these articles which the House of Commons had proposed to them, to be unnecessary, and that others of them were already provided for, and that the uniformity of Common Prayer had been established by Parliament."*

His Lordship certainly conducted himself through this arduous business with as much impartiality and moderation as possible. For though he allowed Sampson and others of his party to communicate to him their wishes and complaints, and though he certainly judged the Archbishop to be somewhat too hasty in his censures, and not legally correct in some of his proceedings,† yet no sooner had the House of Commons presented the articles of their petition to the Upper House, than the Lord Treasurer sent a copy of them to the Archbishop, requiring his judgment of them. His Grace judged it proper to make a full answer to them, which he presented to the Queen herself, not omitting, however, to transmit a copy to the Lord Treasurer, with a letter, setting forth the great danger of the proposed Articles, as tending to innovation, which her Majesty loved not to hear of, wherein she did, in his opinion, both graciously and wisely; in this letter he thanks his Lordship, for his great care in sending to him the heads of the petition, hoping he would impute what he did to no other cause, than for conscience sake, and duty to the Church; and as for all the hard speeches‡ uttered against him, he had learned through God's goodness

* An able answer to these petitions was also drawn up by the Bishop of Winchester, which may be seen amongst the other proceedings at this time, in the Life of Whitgift, b. iii. ch. x.

† See Neal's History of the Puritans, 1584. Lord Burghley, however, certainly expected the Archbishop might have much to allege in his own vindication.

‡ Among these hard speeches, may be reckoned the clamour raised against the Archbishop, for reviving in his county a Popish tyranny, and thereby endangering the Queen; for the Church at this time had two enemies to encounter, though perhaps Puritanism was the worst, in as much patiently to bear them, assuring himself of his Lordship, for whom he would not cease daily to pray.

Though we have now broken in upon the year 1585, according to the common reckoning at this time, we shall conclude what we have to say of this session of Parliament,* by observing, that besides the Petition before-mentioned, other bills relating to ecclesiastical matters were devised and brought into the Lower House, "all to clip the Bishops' wings," as Strype says, "and to weaken (if not to destroy) their Courts;" and this took place while the Convocation was sitting, and employed in framing good regulations for the Clergy,† and in contempt, as it were (for indeed the Speaker excused them afterwards), of the Queen's prohibition, who, judging it to trench upon her Ecclesiastical Supremacy, charged them not to deal in causes of the Church.

The Archbishop did all he could do, to stop these proceedings of Parliament, Laws being so different from Canons Ecclesiastical in the adjustment of ecclesiastical matters, since whatever was passed in Parliament, could not afterwards be altered but in Parliament, what necessity soever might urge thereunto, as he wrote to the Queen; but indeed, her Majesty herself was sufficiently moved at these proceedings, and desirous of securing to the Bishops and Clergy in Convocation, the right of judging and deciding upon such points, so that though the proposed bills in a great measure came to nothing this session, yet she could not part with her Parliament without some reproof from her own mouth, in a speech, some passages of which are very curious: "There be some fault finders," said her Majesty, "with the Order of the Clergy, which so may make a slander to myself and the Church, whose over-ruler God hath made me, whose negligence cannot be excused, if any as in its great enmity to Popery, it was always forward to confound the Church with the latter, thereby weakening its defence against Popery, while it lay open to their own attacks. By this division amongst the Protestants themselves, the interest against Popery, which required their united strength, was greatly weakened.

* In the course of this session, to shorten long arguments, some impatient members had recourse to such coughing, spitting, and other interruptions, that Sir Francis Hastings made a regular motion to suppress such rudenesses. Quære, are they yet suppressed?

† See the Decreta Cleri, Cantuariens, in Synodo Londinensi, Feb. 1584, which the Archbishop sent to Lord Burghley.—Life of Whitgift, Appendix, xviii. and Bishop Sparrow's Collections, in which latter is an alteration, supposed to have been suggested by Lord Burghley himself.

schisms or errors heretical were suffered: thus much I must say, that some faults and negligences may grow and be (as in all other great charges it happeneth), and what vocation without? all which, if you my Lords of the Clergy do not amend, I mean to depose you;* look ye therefore well to your charges, this may be amended without heedless or open exclamations. I am supposed to have many studies, but most philosophical, I must yield this to be true, that I suppose few (that be no professors) have read more, and I need not tell you that I am so simple that I understand not, nor so forgetful that I remember not; and yet amidst my many volumes I hope God's book has not been my seldomest lectures, in which we find that which by reason (for my part) we ought to believe; that seeing so great wickednesses and griefs in the world in which we live, but as wayfaring pilgrims, we must suppose that God would never have made us but for a better place, and of more comfort than we find here. I know no creature that breatheth whose life standeth hourly in more peril than my own; who entered not into my state, without sight of manifold dangers of life and crown, as one that had the mightiest and greatest to wrestle with. If I were not persuaded that mine [i. e. my religion] were the true way of God's will, God forbid that I should live to prescribe it to you. I see many over bold with God Almighty, making too many subtle scannings of his blessed will, as lawyers do with human testaments. The presumption is so great, as I may not suffer it (yet mind I not hereby to animate Romanists, which, what adversaries they be to mine estate is sufficiently known†) nor tolerate new-fangleness. I mean to guide them both by God's holy true rule. In both parts be perils, but of the latter [i. e. the new-fangled sort] I must pronounce them dangerous to a kingly rule [i. e. monarchy]. To have every man according to his own censure to make a doom [i. e. pronounce sentence] of the validity and privity of his Prince's government, and that with a common

* "'Tis plain from this," says Collier, "the Queen was led into a mispersuasion concerning the Regale; she delivers herself as if she had an apostolical commission within her dominions, and her power was paramount to the Episcopal College," ii. 595.

† It is very curious that Elizabeth should not only have been accused of Popery by the Puritans of her own days, but very long after by their champion Mr. Neal, who affirms, that though they were her greatest enemies, she had a peculiar tenderness for them; "one would have thought," says he, "these formidable conspiracies of the Roman Catholics should have alienated the Queen's heart from them." It is, however, still more curious, to find the Catholics quite as ready to reproach her for her barbarous treatment of their party.

veil and cover of God's word; whose followers must not be judged but by private men's expositions. I pray God to defend you from such a ruler who so evil will guide you."*—Odd as many passages of this speech must sound to modern ears, there is in it much of good sense and true history. The Puritans, in their zeal against the hierarchy of the Church, accused her Majesty of a leaning towards Popery, though she had not in the world greater enemies than the Papists, and that as much as anything from her not leaving things in the state she found them on the demise of her sister; that is, subjected once more to the authority of the See of Rome. The system of the Puritans, their platform and discipline of Geneva, was to England new-fangleness, connected with political principles so bordering upon democracy or popular government, as to leave no hereditary monarch safe; while as to doctrine, as well as discipline, her Majesty was undoubtedly competent by her reading, including particularly a study of the Fathers, to judge between all parties, more perhaps than any other Prince in Europe, and much more than the generality of her sex; we ought to consider besides what was the part her Majesty really took upon this occasion; Leicester was against her, Walsingham, Sir Francis Knollys (who had been a great friend of Knox), and others high in her councils; Lord Burghley not so strict against the Puritans, as her Metropolitans and some other Bishops, and yet she was decidedly on the side of those who were for upholding the laws and defending the Constitution in Church and State. We cannot help giving her the credit so well expressed by Whitgift himself in his letter to Lord Burghley, that "her Majesty wished not to hear of innovations; wherein she did, in his opinion, both graciously and wisely; especially seeing the laws and orders already established were such as could not justly be impeached."

Whitgift had certainly a right to say so, from the situation he held, his great learning, the part he had taken against Cartwright, which must have led him

* At the conclusion of the session the Speaker also, Serjeant Puckering, delivered a speech, not to be found in D'Ewes, but which Strype has printed in the third volume of his Annals, from minutes of the Lord Burghley, the whole being as he tells us "methodised by a form drawn up by the head and pen of his Lordship."—See book i. ch. xxiv. sub ann. 1585. Strype professes to have copied the speech in order to shew (alluding to the association) what a good understanding there was between the Queen and her people, and how dear she was to them; and what a value they had in those times for the religion rescued from Popery.—Vol. iii. 432. The whole speech may be seen in the Appendix, No. 51.

to inquire diligently into all the subjects in dispute between them, and because his conscience seems clearly to have led him to say so, in the face of all at the Council Board who were disposed to censure his proceedings, not excepting Lord Burghley himself, who certainly had questioned the prudence of the Archbishop in so strictly requiring subscription to his twenty-four articles, much to the concern, though by no means to the intimidation of the worthy Prelate, who professed, at any hazard of the loss of friends, to be "determined to discharge his duty and his conscience without fear;" this he wrote in a letter to the Lord Treasurer himself,* the beginning of which, for the credit of both, deserves to be transcribed. Being dated July 15, 1584.—"My singular good Lord,—God knoweth, how desirous I have been from time to time, to satisfy your Lordship in all things, and to have my doings approved by you. For which cause since my coming to this place (the See of Canterbury), I did nothing of importance without your advice. I have risen early, and sat up late, to write unto you such objections and answers as are used on either side. I have not done the like to any man; and shall I now say that I have lost my labour? or shall my just dealing with two of the most disordered Ministers in a whole diocese (the obstinacy and contempt of whom, especially of one of them, yourself would not bear in any subjected to your authority) cause you so to think and speak of my doings and myself? No man living should have made me believe it.—My Lord, an old friend is better than a new; and I trust your Lordship will not so lightly cast off your old friends for any of these new-fangled and factious sectaries: whose endeavour is to make division wheresoever they come, and separate old and assured friends."

Thus earnestly and feelingly did the Archbishop write to his old friend upon this trying occasion; for very trying it was to both these great personages. Lord Burghley was probably looking to have more peace, not absolutely per-

* We feel that we are doing some justice to the Archbishop upon this occasion, if not to Lord Burghley also, by noticing the letters of the former, because Macdiarmid has copied Lord Burghley's remonstrance in such a manner as to leave an impression on the mind of his readers, that Lord Burghley was as adverse to the hierarchy of the Church, as the most violent of the Puritans, which was certainly far from being the case; he would have brought both parties to an agreement if he could, and was always for mild measures. "In Council," says Macdiarmid, "he always appeared the strenuous advocate of mild, moderate, and conciliatory measures;" but this does in no manner prove that he sacrificed his own opinions to those of Elizabeth, in giving countenance to Episcopacy, as that writer would insinuate; who, in his censures of Archbishop Parker, seems to forget that he was actually made a Primate upon the particular recommendation of Cecil.

haps by concession, but connivance, until a better and more regular set of conforming ministers could be provided;* the Archbishop looked straitly to the duties of his high post; "I have taken upon me," as he wrote to the same Lord, "the defence of the religion and rites of this Church; the execution of the law concerning the same; the appeasing of the sects and schisms therein; the reduction of the ministers thereof to uniformity and due obedience.—Herein I intend to be constant: which also my place, my person, my duty, the laws, her Majesty and the goodness of the cause requireth of me! and wherein your Lordship and others (all things considered) ought, as I take it, to assist and help me." This was plain and honest, and it may be lamented, that the schisms and sectaries to which he alludes, affected the peace and quiet of the Church, at so trying a time, so much as they did. But we must add, that the Archbishop kept his word, "who," as it is written of him, "seeing the great danger of the overthrow of the religion happily reformed at first, viz. of the doctrine of it by Papists, and the discipline and constitution of it by the new Reformers, devoted himself, his pains, his studies, his learning, his interest, to the preserving of it, wherein he had success to the end of his days, though through much opposition."

Lord Burghley, indeed, had foreseen what would happen, when, even on her Majesty's accession, he had reckoned this among the dangers that might ensue upon the proposed alteration of religion, that "Many such as would gladly have the alteration from the Church of Rome, when they shall see, peradventure, that some old ceremonies shall be left still, or that their doctrine which they embrace, is not allowed and commanded ONLY,† and all other abolished and

* See in Strype's Annals, iii. Appendix, No. xlix. a curious letter to Lord Burghley, half Latin and half Greek, from Fox the Martyrologist, to obtain the Queen's confirmation of his prebend in the Church of Sarum, written about this time.

† It deserves very much to be attended to, that the Puritans would make no allowances for Lutheranism; what was at all contrary to the Geneva platform, was unreformed Papistry; though nothing can be plainer than that in King Edward's Reformation, now restored, there was much of Lutheranism introduced, which gave as great offence to the Puritans, as Papistry itself. But as the Lutheran sense of the articles was not forced upon the Puritans, it was (as has been well observed), unreasonable narrowness in them to be displeased, that the Calvinistic sense was not imposed upon the Lutherans. Yet displeased they were, which must shew, that whatever outcries were raised by the Puritans, for a larger toleration, they were not prepared to make any such allowances for others. The comprehensive character of the articles, in an age when religious toleration was no where rightly understood or practised, deserves to be regarded, as a considerdisproved, shall be discontented and call the alteration a cloaked Papistry, or a mingle-mangle."

All this, indeed, was now exemplified, and became a sad addition to the other troubles which agitated and disturbed the nation. We have given the Primate credit for a most conscientious firmness and steadiness in discharge of what he held to be his duties, as enumerated above. Lord Burghley's letter to the Archbishop, which called forth the answer alluded to, may be seen in Strype's Life of the Archbishop, Appendix, No. ix. b. iii. He judged the Archbishop's twenty-four articles to be too inquisitorial, and such as should not be propounded indiscriminately to all Ministers, though not amiss for such as might be suspected of any notorious offences in Papistry or heresy. His Lordship adds, "I desire the peace of the Church. I desire concord and unity in the exercise of our religion. I favour no sensual and wilful recusants. It may be, the Canonists may maintain this proceeding, by rules of their laws, but though omnia licent, yet omnia non expediunt.* This then, we may hope, was the chief able step towards it, on the part of the Church of England. But it is very remarkable, that because in hopes of leaving a door open both for Papists and Lutherans, some latitude as to the real presence, was charitably left to persons known to be of different persuasions, on a point so inexplicable, even Sampson and Humphrey, otherwise very learned and wise persons, complained of the omission of the explanatory article, as having rendered Elizabeth's Prayer-Book inferior to Edward's; whereas, it was an omission which gave liberty, by putting no arbitrary construction upon a tenet, to the exclusion of those, who might be conciliated by only leaving it undefined. In fact, it was quite unreasonable in the Puritans, to quarrel with the Bishops for upholding the established discipline of the Church, when they themselves would not admit any to the Sacrament, who would not "fully consent to the doctrine, and implicitly submit themselves to the discipline of their own Church."

* Neal, in his History of the Puritans, having curtailed Lord Burghley's letter, it is but doing justice both to his Lordship and the Archbishop, to supply what is wanting. "When the Lord Treasurer Burleigh," says Neal, "had read over the interrogatories, and seen the execution they had done upon the Clergy, he writ the Archbishop of Canterbury the following letter." But he is careful (and Macdiarmid the same), to suppress every thing in the letter that looks favourably to the Archbishop; particularly the following clause: "Against which," [the complaints made of the Archbishop], "I answer, that I think your Grace doth nothing, but being duly examined, tendeth to the maintenance of the religion established, and to avoid schism in the Church. I have, also, for example, shewed upon your papers sent to me, how fully the Church is furnished with preachers, and how small a number there are that do contend for their singularity." The Archbishop's answer too, which Mr. Strype calls "a wary, wise, and resolute letter," Neal passes over, merely saying, that the Archbishop wrote a long answer. This is not fair, though the answer itself certainly did not, in all points, satisfy the Treasurer. Whitgift will never be forgiven by the ground of difference between these two very eminent men; namely, the expediency of the Archbishop's measures. We are bound to believe that both desired "the peace of the Church;" "concord and unity;" but as to the exact mode of accomplishing these great objects, upon some points they certainly differed. In the mean while, it seems to have been difficult to get at the exact truth of things, and Lord Burghley, in some cases, appears to have been deceived, especially as to the conduct and characters of persons for whom he was led to interpose, as the Archbishop, in one of his letters, strongly intimates. "If they otherwise report to your Lordship, they report untruly; a quality wherewith this sect is marvellously possessed; as myself, of my own knowledge and experience, can justify against divers of them."

Puritans, nor Cecil by the Papists, but we believe that both were very conscientiously doing what they felt to be their duty; the one in support of the crown, the other of the laws; both of which were subjected to equally rude and violent attacks.

In order to account for the politics of the English Court from this time, we must look to the projects and designs of Spain. The power and disposition of Philip were equally formidable to England; whatever his power might enable him to accomplish against Elizabeth, his disposition was likely to incline, prompt, and invite him to do. The delivery of Mary was an excuse sufficiently plausible to the Catholics in general, though, perhaps, nothing was less in the scope of Philip's own contemplation than her safety, and restoration to the throne of her ancestors, whether in Scotland or England. If, by the destruction of Elizabeth, and fall of Mary in the struggle, he could find his own way to the vacant crown, it is scarcely to be doubted but it would have been to him the most gratifying issue to which things could be brought. Mary was too closely connected with France, by her birth, to be trusted by Philip, even in her own kingdom of Scotland, whatever he might pretend to the contrary. He had often before wished and endeavoured to make himself King of England; and as his power increased, the more grasping he became. He was, at this very time, by means of the league, looking to the chance of becoming King of France; and could that have been accomplished, to the prejudice of Henry of Bourbon, the Protestant King of Navarre, it is naturally to be concluded that the small dominions of the latter would soon have been added to his other acquisitions. It appears to have been pretty generally suspected, even at this time, that he had some grand project on foot, though the precise object seemed to baffle the skill of diplomatists, and other state spies,* to discover. The effect upon Elizabeth, however, was clearly to hasten her connection with the States, and to accede to their proposals, so often repeated, of putting themselves under her protection,† trying even to tempt her and her Ministers by expectations of great profit. In one proposal submitted to the Lord Treasurer, it was calculated that her Majesty might gain 10,000*l.* monthly, and Lord Burghley himself 1000*l.*, if England would but administer to the States the aid they asked. It is to the credit of Lord Burghley that, in taking the proposal into consideration, he positively disclaimed and renounced all profit to himself, engaging to look only to the interests of the common cause. The assistance asked, however, was at length granted, and a very able and powerful declaration put forth, drawn up, as it is conjectured, by Lord Burghley

* Being continually obliged to speak of the employment of spies, by the Ministers of Elizabeth, it may not be amiss to shew, that, in those days, the knowing how to tamper with such instruments was judged to be a most praiseworthy accomplishment, even in an accredited Ambassador. In the preface to the embassies of the celebrated French minister, de Noailles, the following occurs in praise of François de Noailles, Bishop of Acqs: On voit dans les dépêches de l'Eveque, avec quelle habitude il decouvroit les desseins secrets de cette Princesse (Mary of England), et du Roi son Mari (Philip II.) qui avoient resolu de joindre leurs forces et de surprendre les frontières du royaume. Il gagne un espion qu'on avoit chargé d' examiner les fortifications des principales places de Normandie, qui, a son retour, fit un rapport conforme aux interêts de la France, et tel que ce Ministre le lui avoit prescrit."

† In a letter written by the celebrated Adrian Saravia to Lord Burghley, from Leyden, June 9, 1585, he considers the safety of England, and even the life of the Queen, to be dependent on the issue of the contest in Holland. "Eoque magis, quod salus et vita Sereniss. D. nostra Reginæ, et regni Angliæ incolumitas cum pariculo nostro conjuncta videatur" "qui nobis inimici sunt, non sunt vobis amici." "Consilia communium hostium quotidie magis et magis patefiunt; et quo spectent videre potestis—expectandum non est donec perierimus. Nam casus harum provinciarum trahet secum ruinam Angliæ." He judges it to be quite necessary, from the aspect of things, that the friends of the Reformation should unite in one general confederacy, and particularly that Elizabeth should either form a close alliance with the Hollanders, or accept the government of their country. "Quorum posterum," he adds, "tum tutissimum, tum utilissimum utrique est futurum."

himself,* stating the causes which moved her Majesty to give aid in "defence of the people oppressed in the Low Countries." As soon as this was fairly determined upon, Davison was sent over to condole with them on the loss of Antwerp, which had just been surrendered to the Duke of Parma, to make all necessary arrangements for the supplies of men and money to be sent, and adjust the stipulated securities ;† while Lord Leicester was appointed the Queen's General in those parts, to assist them with advice and authority, carrying with him 5000 foot and 1000 horse : it being agreed that he should have a place in the Council of State, and that no peace should be made but by mutual consent. His nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, was nominated Governor of Flushing, and Sir Thomas Cecil, the Lord Treasurer's eldest son, Governor of the Brill, with a positive assurance that the objects of the Queen's assistance being attained, no attempt would be made to keep longer possession of the towns thus placed under her guard, for the access and recess of troops, &c. and that the Governors appointed should exercise no authority over the inhabitants. To shew upon what terms her Majesty might reasonably form this alliance, on the advice of Lord Burghley, we cannot do better than insert, in addition to what may be found in the declaration referred to, a few passages of the answer given by Bedel, an Irish Bishop, to one Waddesworth, a Jesuit, who had thrown great blame on the English for assisting subjects against their lawful Prince; a consideration which had before much deterred her Majesty from interfering as she was requested to do. "Do you think," said he, "subjects are bound to give their throats to be cut by their fellow-subjects [set over them by their Prince] or by their Princes, at their mere will, against their own laws and edicts? You would know, quo jure, the Protestant wars in France and Holland are justified. First, the law of nature, which not only alloweth, but inclineth and enforceth every thing, to defend itself from violence. Secondly, that of nations, which permitteth those that are in the protection of others, to whom they owe no more than an honourable acknowledgment, in case they go about to make themselves absolute Sovereigns, and usurp their liberty, to resist and stand for the same: and if any lawful Prince (which is not yet lord of his subjects' lives and goods), in this attempt to spoil them of the same, under colour of reducing them to his own religion, after all humble remonstrances, they may stand upon their guard; and, being assailed, repel force by force, as did the Maccabees under Antiochus: in which case notwithstanding, the person of the Prince himself ought always to be sacred and inviolable, as was Saul to David.

* This declaration is to be seen in Hollinshed, and in Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. Part ii. 472.

† His instructions, which are printed in the Appendix to the Annals, B. i. No. liii. are said to have been drawn up by Lord Burghley, being in the hand-writing of one of his secretaries.

Lastly, if the enraged Minister of a lawful Prince [such as Duc d' Alva was in Holland] will abuse his authority, against the fundamental laws of the country, it is no rebellion to defend themselves against force; reserving still their obedience to their Sovereign inviolate."

We have copied this, because, in truth, the fundamental laws and ancient liberties of the states and cities of the Low Countries had been so notoriously violated by Philip II., that he had, by his own act, discharged his subjects from their allegiance,* broken the compact, and thereby forfeited all his claims and titles to the Sovereignty. They were really therefore not rebellious subjects, but discharged, and left to their own resources. It is true, the Pope had dissolved Philip from the obligation of the oath, by which he was bound to defend their rights, liberties, and privileges; but what was this dispensation in the eyes of those who, in renouncing Philip, renounced the authority of the Pope also, which was the case with the Northern Provinces at the least, to which provinces Leicester was now sent?

* See the Queen's Declaration as above; in which the dealings of the Spanish Minister, Mendoza, are more fully disclosed, evidently tending to an invasion of England, by Spanish and other forces, introduced into the Low Countries contrary to the laws and privileges of the States; as at the commencement of the Queen's reign, foreign forces were in like manner introduced into Scotland, through the influence of the Guises, for the conquest of the Crown of England, in behalf of their niece Queen Mary. "A matter most manifest to the common knowledge of the world."—The Declaration concludes with a succinct statement of the Queen's views in the following terms:—"To procure for the States a deliverance from war, by the Spaniards and foreigners; a restitution of their ancient liberties and government, by some Christian peace; and thereby a surety for ourselves and our realm, to be free from invading neighbours; and our people to enjoy in those countries their lawful commerce, and intercourse of friendship and merchandize, according to ancient usage and treaties." Her Majesty was judged to have committed herself so far by this measure, and with such bold defiance of Philip's great power, that the King of Sweden is said to have pronounced, that she, by so doing, had taken "the diadem from her head." At the foot of this declaration may be seen an answer also, to a scurrilous work, published at Milan, entitled Nuovo Adviso, reflecting greatly on the Queen.

But as this did not take place very early in the year, we must for the present advert to other public transactions. And the first we have to mention is the death of Parry the conspirator, the man who appears notoriously to have deceived Lord Burghley,* whom it was not very easy to deceive, and to have clearly designed to murder the Queen. The account of this man has been so largely written by other historians, that we need scarcely do more than refer to Strype, Camden, Rapin, &c., or to Dr. Lingard, one of the latest writers upon the subject, who generally follows Camden; not, however, without some insinuations against Lord Burghley, and the Queen, which strongly bespeak the prejudice of a party; but which we should certainly not stop to notice, if they were not accompanied with remarks tending to invalidate proofs on which preceding writers have placed great reliance in general. That we know any thing of Parry, though he was in Parliament and a Doctor in the Commons, is entirely attributed to his "real or supposed crime, or rather the use that was made of that crime," but the evidence which Dr. Lingard most disregards, and slurs over, is the celebrated letter from the Cardinal de Como, which Parry, in the presence of Burghley and Walsingham, shewed to the Queen, in proof that he had been solicited by the Pope to murder her.† Dr. Lingard says, "This, however, proved to be no more than a civil answer to a general offer of service; neither his letter [the nuncio Ragazzoni,] nor that of the Cardinal, contained the remotest allusion to the murder. The indulgence mentioned in it was that which was given to persons on their reconciliation—a remission of canonical censures incurred by former offences."—This is the Historian's account of a letter which was supposed at the time to contain all the mischief in the world, and which Parry himself actually produced in proof of the mischief intended, though afterwards, with very reasonable confidence, he defied Topcliffe to find any thing in the letter to criminate himself, or the Pope, or the Cardinal. But see Parry's own interpretation of it in the State Trials, "whereby," these are his own expressions, "I found the enterprise, (i. e. of the Queen's murder) commended and allowed, and myself absolved, in his holiness' name, of all my sins, and willed to go forward in the name of God."

Parry confessed, that he had entertained a design of passing over to England

* See Lingard, v. 414. note 79.

† His object in shewing this to the Queen, was not merely to ingratiate himself in her favour, by making the discovery, but thereby the more readily to gain access to her person for the purposes he had in view.

to murder Elizabeth; but doubted whether it could be made to appear to be lawful before God. He consulted two Jesuits upon it, a Scotchman and an Italian, Creighton and Palma, whose names deserve to be recorded, for they are said to have refused to listen to his proposals; the latter, however, who by Parry's own confession approved his designs, presented him to Campeggio, the Papal minister; from whom he requested a passport, to be procured him from Rome, having matters of importance to communicate to the Pope. Before the passport arrived, he took some alarm, quitted Italy, and went to Paris, where he found Morgan (of whom more hereafter) who introduced him to the Nuncio Raggazoni, to whom he gave a letter for Cardinal Como, the Roman Secretary of State, receiving a promise from the Nuncio, that the answer should be forwarded to him in England, which answer he did receive accordingly, as promised, and which we shall now transcribe:—

"Sir,—His Holiness has seen your letter of the first, with the certificate included, and cannot but commend the good disposition and resolution which you write to hold toward the service and benefit public. Wherein his Holiness doth exhort you to persevere, and to bring to effect that which you have promised. And to the end you may be so much the more holpen by that good spirit which hath moved you thereunto, he granteth unto you his blessing, plenary indulgence, and remission of all your sins, according to your request, assuring you, that beside the merit that you shall receive therefore in heaven, his Holiness will further make himself debtor, to acknowledge your deservings in the best manner he can; and so much the more, in that you use the greater modesty, in not pretending any thing.

"Put therefore your most holy and honourable purposes in execution, and attend your safety; and to conclude, I offer myself unto you heartily, and do desire all good and happy success.

"From Rome, the 30th of January 1584, at the pleasure of your Signorie

"N. Cardinal of Como."*

It is true, indeed, there is not in this letter any direct (we cannot say the remotest) allusion to the murder, it would have been very strange if there had been; but then we are certainly kept agreeably in the dark, as to the precise object of that "good disposition and resolution for the service and benefit public," for which the cardinal gives him credit; that "promise" which remained to be "brought to effect," and to which he "had been moved by the good spirit;" of "the plenary indulgence," not "for former offences," but to which he was to look for "safety," in "putting in execution his most holy and honourable purposes," and to which the cardinal himself desired "all good and happy success." Surely this letter contains something more than a "remission of canonical censures for former offences," and a reconciliatory indulgence. It is asserted, we know, that Parry only wrote to the Pope to say he was returning to England, and hoped to atone for his past misdeeds by his subsequent services to the Catholic Church, and that in this letter also there was no allusion to the design.

We must confess we are too well read in the transactions of the Church of Rome, during the sixteenth century, to be easily persuaded, that under the circumstances mentioned above, the cardinal's letter to a person, whom after all Dr. Lingard allows to have deserved the punishment he received, or, to use his own words, "the death that he suffered" (that is, deserved to be hanged), did not contain "the remotest allusion to the murder," contemplated by Parry. We can scarcely conjecture how a letter from Rome, from the Pope's own secretary, could have been written, more directly encouraging any covert design in the breast of Parry—a plenary indulgence seeming to apply to things to come; and his own letter refers, at least, to subsequent services to the Catholic Church. To expect any very intelligible allusion to a deed so foul, in a letter or letters which, according to the common course of things in those days, might have to run on the passage every chance of being intercepted, is very little consistent with the plainest dictates of common sense. After all, Parry was, by his own account, confirmed in his resolution of killing the Queen, by Cardinal Allen's book, which had pronounced it to be not only lawful, but honourable, to kill Princes excommunicated.

It is merely our regard for the exact truth of history which induces us to enter into such strictures. The author we have just cited may, as a Papist, have his prejudices, as we ourselves have our prejudices in favour of Protestantism, and of our early Reformers; prejudices greatly strengthened, we must confess, rather than relaxed, by what we have read of the temper, spirit, and dark designs of Popery, during the struggle on foot in Lord Burghley's time. God forbid we should be expected to prove that the Protestants were blameless in all they did; but, though the latter were occasionally driven to very sad and lamentable measures of defence, and obliged sometimes to carry things to extremities upon presumptive proofs only, and suspicion of intended mischiefs, yet we must say, from all that is actually known to have happened under the Popish Regimen in France, England, the Low-Countries, &c., the balance of craftiness, as well as cruelty, appears to be greatly on the side of the Romanists; and it is only to prevent that balance being slily made to preponderate against England, and her very able, though not perhaps immaculate statesmen and divines of the sixteenth century, that we enter so far as we sometimes do into transactions of the above nature. Dr. Lingard, in his account of Parry, thinks he deserved to be hanged long before he suffered as a traitor; but is careful to insinuate, at the same time, that probably it would have been so, had not Lord Burghley interposed to save him. Now this is only matter of suspicion; he gives no proof at all of the fact. We do not mean to say it was not so, but as Lord Burghley was certainly deceived in him in many instances, he might be so in this. What we complain of, is the way in which Lord Burghley's name is unnecessarily introduced, in order to insinuate a wilful confederacy with a condemned culprit. Parry, in his confession, acknowledged that he had been condemned, but that not to have pardoned him on that occasion, would have been cruel and tyrannical.—Camden, 307. There are other suspicions thrown out, which indicate a pretty strong bias upon the historian's mind.* The worst is, all who write of those times have a great difficulty to find out the real truth, from the very common practice of recalling or revoking confessions.† Parry confessed very largely what had been the scope of his intentions, the parties with whom he had communicated, and the *dis*couragement, as well as the *en*couragement he had received: but he revoked his

* The account Dr. Lingard gives of the execution is very striking: "Being told to hasten, he repeated the Lord's Prayer in Latin, with some other devotions; the cart was drawn away; and the executioner, catching him at the first swing, instantly cut the rope and butchered him alive;" and he quotes Strype for the authentic account as given to Lord Burghley, "when his heart was taken out, he gave a great groan." It is certainly very horrid, but the sentence for treason was, "to be hanged, and let down alive, and the entrails taken out and burnt in his sight." The executioner therefore did his duty; but what is this to some of the cruelties of the Inquisition?—protracted sufferings; slow fires; and a Catholic king present, of his own good will, to witness the miseries inflicted, as was the case, undoubtedly, with Philip II.

† "When Throckmorton was brought upon his trial, he denied what he had confessed at his examination, affirming, he had invented it on purpose to avoid the rack; but after his condemnation, upon the evidence of his own letters to the Queen of Scots, and the papers found in his coffers, he owned all, and even made a more circumstantial declaration than at first; and yet, when he came to the gallows, he denied again whatever he had confessed."—Rapin.

confession afterwards, and protested his innocence. Yet parties are divided. Those who insist upon his having received encouragement, do not deny that, in some instances, he was discouraged; while those who deny the encouragement, as the Papists do, insist upon the reality of the cases of discouragement, which, in fact, is to acknowledge his purposes.—For a full account, however, of the whole case, we must refer the reader, as before, to Strype, Camden, Rapin, with Hollinshed, and the State Trials.

It is the more necessary to clear these points of history, even at this distant period, as far as it can be done, because the policy of England during the sixteenth century was constantly dependent on the policy of most of the other states of Europe, not in regard merely to peace and war, but to the affront put upon Rome, from the days of Luther, and which had excited a resentment not to be appeased, but by the hope and prospect of another revolution, through the united efforts of all the powers who still continued in subjection to the See of Rome, by which revolution they hoped to be able to bring all things back into their old channel, and probably would have succeeded, could they, at that critical moment, have been able to get the British island into their power, by transferring the crown from the head of Elizabeth to that of a Catholic Prince. England had been guilty of a double offence in the eyes of Rome. After an attempt at reformation, it had been recovered to Rome; Elizabeth's was a second revolt, and nothing perhaps could exceed the anger with which her conduct was viewed by the Catholic powers. Lord Burghley, who had been a party to the preceding reformation under Edward, and a spectator of the return to Popery under Mary, in which so many of his friends and co-adjutors had perished, well knew the risks Elizabeth would incur by declaring herself a friend to Protestantism, and to the restoration of things to the state in which her brother had left them; and he was careful to place them all before her eyes, at the very moment of her accession, so that her Majesty might well say, in a speech we have so lately referred to, that she "entered not into her state without sights of manifold dangers of life and crown, as one that had the mightiest and greatest to wrestle with;" nor was she wrong, probably, in observing that she knew "no creature breathing, whose life stood hourly in more peril than her own." We must confess, for our own parts, that we believe this to have been entirely true, though some would question it, because, as we have so often intimated, dangers averted, in course of time naturally come not to be believed; but besides this, there is great reason why, on the part of those opposed to Elizabeth, to her ministers, and to the reformation generally, the dangers then averted should be discredited, as it alters the whole complexion of things, and gives a turn to the history of our own country at that time exceedingly disadvantageous; for if the intrigues of the Court of Rome against Elizabeth, her crown, and dignity, against her kingdom, and the Protestant Church of England, are not to be believed, the policy of the country must appear to have been inexcusably harsh, cruel, and severe; but if they are to be believed to their utmost extent, the case is entirely changed, and we must look upon whatever came to pass as a series of extreme cases to which the Government was driven, to ward off impending and indisputable dangers.

We may now proceed to observe, that such information appears to have reached the Court in the summer of this year from abroad, of persons to be sent over to practise some great mischief, that it was judged necessary to send to all parts of the coast, to institute the most careful and diligent search and inquiry, in regard to individuals resorting to the kingdom. Some of the particulars of this information are contained in the following passage:

"That Savage was sent to assassinate the Queen, and that Throckmorton, Paget, and other refugees were creeping into England; joining with the Guises in the Holy League, and by bringing in war into this kingdom, to depose or murder Queen Elizabeth, and to place Mary the Scots' Queen in her room."

And foreseeing how necessary it was to be ready against any invasion, general musters were made, in which the young gentlemen of the several counties were, as far as possible, to be included. The Intriguers, in the mean while, to prepare their way, were careful to send into the kingdom books calculated to excite throughout the nation a feeling that Elizabeth was not the rightful possessor of the throne, and that she lay under such an interdict of the Pope of Rome, as was of validity to discharge all persons from their allegiance, one such book being Cardinal Allen's "Apology and true declaration* of the institution and endeavour of the two English Colleges." These Colleges being the Seminaries of Rome and Rheimes, set up at the Pope's charge, "That capital envier of the State, disturber of the Queen's peace, and pursuer of her person,"

* See the trial of Thomas Alfield, a Jesuit, arraigned for bringing this book into the Realm.—Annals, iii. 449. He confessed that he had brought over five or six hundred copies of this book, but maintained that it was a loyal book, though it spake of the Queen as not the lawful Queen of England, for two reasons—her birth, and her excommunication—and that she sought (that is, at the Pope's hands) neither dispensation for the first, nor absolution for the last.

as he was called by a learned writer of those times, to allure young persons from England, to be educated there, and sent back under sworn agents of the Pope, and bound to all obedience to the See of Rome.—Over the College at Rome, Cardinal Allen himself presided; his book now brought into England, as was shewn by Dr. Bilson, Warden of Winchester, in a work entitled, "the true difference between Christian subjection, and unchristian rebellion,"* charged the Queen's Government with no less crimes than heresy, tyranny, and blasphemy; "debasing and traducing the right of her authority, and band of obedience; as if the sovereignty used by her highness were a thing improbable, unreasonable, unnatural, impossible; and the oath of allegiance intolerable, repugnant to God, the Church, her Majesty's honour, and all men's consciences." —But of this literary contest between the Popish accusers of our country, and England's defenders, more may be seen in Strype; nor should we indeed dwell so much upon them as we do, were there not still a disposition prevalent, to depreciate, or dispute, the dangers to which this Queen's person and government were continually exposed, and thereby to stigmatize all that was done for her protection, and for the protection of the constitution in Church and State, as an undeviating system of fraud, persecution, and cruelty; though, upon as full an investigation as we have been able to give to the subject, it appears to us to have been quite otherwise; severities indeed were practised, but not till they were provoked by the conduct of Elizabeth's great enemies; open rebellion was openly put down, but the greatest dangers to which Elizabeth was exposed, being of an insidious, treacherous, and deceitful nature, as all the practices of Rome, Spain, France, Flanders, and Scotland really were, the policy of England must be exposed to misrepresentation, as long as it is in the power of those who take a contrary part, to deny that what was prevented, was ever intended. On the determination of one question all the merit of Elizabeth's truly faithful Counsellors may be said to depend, but of Lord Burghley particularly; it being his constantly professed and avowed object, to defend his Sovereign, and maintain her on the throne, which he most conscientiously judged to belong to her, which she had attained to principally through his care, prudence, and good judgment, and which was mainly connected with all his wise plans for the advancement of England in wealth, power, glory, freedom, and independence.

As to the affairs of the Church and Universities this year, which always brought some addition of care and anxiety to Lord Burghley,* we may, as on former occasions, be reasonably content to refer our readers to the diligent compilations of Strype, noticing, as briefly as possible, a few only of those particular cases in which Lord Burghley was called upon to decide or take a part.† We have already noticed the communications between the Archbishop and himself upon the subject of puritanical non-conformity; in which the Archbishop appears to have been somewhat more firm and decided than his friend, though the views and wishes of both appear to have been the same.‡ Of their good dispositions in the midst of these particular struggles, a remarkable proof occurred this year in the return from abroad of the Archbishop's celebrated antagonist, Cartwright, who had been several years absent on the Continent, in consequence of the troubles he had created in the Church, by his

* Bishop Aylmer observed to Lord Burghley upon one occasion, that his Lordship might justly say, not only Reipublicæ, but, with St. Paul, Mihi incumbit cura Omnium Ecclesiarum.

† In regard to the Universities, Lord Burghley was called upon to settle a question of privilege at Cambridge, about the nomination of vintners there, with the regulation of the prices of wines, which was judged to rest entirely with the University. In the course of the year, Lord Leicester, as Chancellor of Oxford, caused a new printing-press to be erected there; the first book printed was dedicated to the Chancellors of both Universities, Lord Burghley being associated with Leicester in this honour; it was a book of ethics, by one Case, entitled, "Speculum quæstionum Moralium." There was something of a contest on foot between the two Universities, at this time, on the score of antiquity, which, in the above book, was recommended to the notice of the two Chancellors, as a childish and trifling contest, considering how united the two bodies were upon cases of greater importance. As we have lived to see a most harmonious association of both Universities in the metropolis, we cannot forbear copying a passage from this book, which might well apply as an inscription for this admirable institution: "Non de nugis, non de antiquitatis titulis et umbris inanis gloriosæ contendimus. Quippe nunc utrinque in utriusque corpus numerose inserti, una, ut ita dicam, Academia sumus, Oxonia Cantabrigiensis, et Cantabrigia Oxoniensis." The two Universities were this year rivals for the attainment of some books belonging to the Lord Lumley, which he was disposed to bestow upon one of them; he was High Steward of Oxford, but had been a scholar at Cambridge; the latter University seems to have obtained the preference. It is curious in these days to know, that the books thus contended for amounted only to about 89, as the following entry in the University catalogue shews: "Honorabilis Dominus Lumley dedit libros 89 aut circiter." We must add what follows: "His accensendi sunt hon. vir dñs Nic. Bacon magni sigilli custos, et dñs Guil. Cecil," who together gave 200 books, Latin and Greek; whereof Sir Nic. Bacon gave 103.

writings and readings in the University and elsewhere, against the established order of things; but now being desirous of returning to his native country and friends, but apprehensive of what might happen, he addressed an elegant Latin epistle to the Lord Treasurer, praying him to use his interest with the Queen for his safety; a necessary precaution, and which, as it turned out, had its effect; for he was kindly dealt with both by Lord Burghley and the Archbishop, for which the latter received the special thanks of Lord Leicester.

This was the year in which the celebrated contest took place for the Mastership of the Temple, between Travers and (to give him the distinction long appropriated to his name, the "judicious") Hooker,* author of the great work on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. The life of this very learned man by Isaac Walton, is so generally known and so much read by all lovers of biography, that it would be impertinent to do more than refer to it, for the whole history of the contest (and subsequent controversy) to which we have alluded, and which we are compelled to acknowledge, as far the Mastership was concerned, was decided against Lord Burghley, who befriended Travers, as a good Preacher, "well learned, very honest, and well allowed and loved of the generality of that House," as he wrote to the Archbishop, having been inquired of by the Queen about him; Travers, it seems, had often preached before his family. The Archbishop had recommended Dr. Bond, the Queen's Chaplain, of whom Lord Burghley also had a good opinion, but the Queen doubted his sufficiency in point of health and strength; to Travers the Archbishop objected greatly, as a turbulent member of the University of Cambridge while he presided there, and as the author of the book De Disciplina Ecclesiastica, spoken of before; nor was he disposed to approve his orders taken at Antwerp. Hooker obtained the situation not at all on his own request, or by his own desire, but on the nomination of Archbishop Sandys, the father of one of his earliest friends and pupils; Travers was continued in the office of Lecturer, till the great difference of opinion between himself and Hooker produced a separation. In the controversy which was carried on between these two eminent men, we do not find that the Lord Treasurer took any other part, than that of receiving from the hands of Travers certain articles of false doctrine objected to Hooker, and which his Lordship very justly and honourably appears to have immediately communicated to the person accused, that he might consider and make a reply to them. The case, however, affords us a particular opportunity of setting forth the extreme impartiality of Lord Burghley, in regard to the controversies then on foot. In the contest for the Mastership, he befriended and supported Travers; Hooker, however, obtained it, Travers continuing Lecturer, thereby having it in his power to preach every Sunday a doctrine different from that of the Master, and which he is represented carefully to have done, so that the Templars were doomed to listen to one doctrine preached in the morning, and another in the evening. Things could not be expected to go on so, and a separation was sought. Then it was that Travers sent his objections to Hooker's doctrine to the Lord Treasurer, in which he accused Hooker of preaching the doctrines of Corranus and Baro, that is, the doctrines of the Anti-Calvinists. Now Baro was an intimate of the Lord Burghley, admitted to his very table as a learned foreigner, and placed by him at Cambridge in the Divinity Chair as the Lady Margaret's professor, where, by preaching such doctrines as Hooker preached, he was brought into trouble, and almost driven out of Cambridge by the rigid Calvinists or Predestinarians, had not Lord Burghley taken his part, and very warmly remonstrated with his opponents, the strict Predestinarians; whose tenets, indeed, his Lordship so far from approving, condemned, as charging God with cruelty.—See Biographia Britannica, art. Baro, note [B]. Another case, something similar, seems as strongly to mark Lord Burghley's impartiality, though it might, perhaps, carry him sometimes too far in countenancing sectaries; we mean the case of Glover, [Annals, iii. 634.] who fell into difficulties for maintaining doctrines more conformable to those of Baro and Corranus, than to Calvin, Travers, or even Luther. This did not proceed from indifference on the part of Lord Burghley, but when he saw any worth in the persons, he tried all means to render them conformable, as was the case with his relative the head of the Brownists, or to prevent their errors, if harmless to the state, from being too severely visited. We ought, in justice to Collier, who is never very indulgent to the Puritans, to observe, that he gives Travers credit for possessing many good qualities as a Preacher and Divine. For the rest, we must refer to Walton's Life, prefixed to the eight books of the Ecclesiastical Polity, in the Oxford edition of that great work, and to Strype's Life of Whitgift.

We find in Strype's Annals, under this year, ch. xxvi., references made to Lord Burghley, by Archbishop Sandys, the Bishops of Norwich, Lichfield and Coventry, and Ely; for the particulars of which, as cases not likely to be at all interesting to the reader, we must refer to the historian, only observing, that he seldom misses an occasion of speaking of his Lordship, as one "to whose wisdom and impartiality the Bishops used always to make their applications," and "the common friend of the oppressed."*

But he could not escape slander, how much soever he might endeavour to conciliate the good-will of his contemporaries. It was not, indeed, to be expected; his situation compelled him oftentimes, no doubt, to attend more to his public duties, than his private feelings; and in defending his Queen and country, to expose himself to the enmity, ill-will, and detraction of those, who had far other objects in view. That in this particular year (1585), he was so slandered, is to be collected from the letters published by Strype, in the Appendix to the 3d vol. of his Annals, Nos. lviii. lix. &c. extracts from which are introduced into his history; but as we think those extracts not the best that might have been selected for the vindication of Lord Burghley, and the letters themselves are too long wholly to transcribe, we shall venture to copy some other passages, indicative, not merely of his Lordship's just resentment of such foul aspersions, but of his indignant and scornful defiance and challenge of all proof against him. The letters, we should observe, are addressed to some friend who had communicated to him the slanderous reports of his enemies. "I am determined," says his Lordship, "to adhere to God, my only patron, and shall be ready to answer all spirits, wheresoever I may find them blazing; and doubt not, but if they would to myself but breathe any of these speeches, in presence of any honest company, I would, with most apparent truth, confound their blasphemies. And, therefore, as you shew yourself friendly in reporting these villanies to me, so you might shew your friendship in effect to my good, if you would advise them to charge me therewith. And if they do think me guilty thereof, they need not fear to accuse me; for I am not worthy to continue in this place; but I will yield myself worthy, not only to be removed, but to be punished for an example to others, that should not abuse her Majesty, and the office I hold. If they cannot prove all the lies they remember, let them make use of any one proof wherewith to prove me guilty of falsehood, injustice, bribery, of dissimulation, of double dealing in advice, in Council, either with her Majesty, or with the Counsellors. Let them charge me in any point, that I have not dealt as earnestly for the Queen's Majesty to aid the afflicted in the Low Countries, to withstand the increasing power of the King of Spain, the assurance of the King of Scots to be tied with her Majesty with reward, yea, with the greatest pension that any other hath; if in any of these, I may be proved to have been behind, or slower than any, in a discreet manner, as becometh a servant and a Counsellor, I will yield myself worthy of perpetual reproach, as though I were guilty of all that they use to bluster against me. They that say, in a rash and malicious mockery, that England is become Regnum Cecilianum, may please their own cankered humour with such a device; but if my actions be considered, if there be any cause given by me of such a nickname, there may be found out in many other juster causes to attribute other names than mine.

* There can be no doubt but that he was continually referred to by the Bishops, and was continually receiving their thanks for his attentions and services; and yet, it is equally certain, that he often sought to mitigate the severities practised against the Puritans. The conclusion to be drawn from this, seems to be, that he had hopes of conciliating the latter by lenity; of the impossibility of which, however, he had often pretty strong proofs, particularly at Cambridge, where he would restore persons dispossessed of their fellowships, in hopes of bringing them to conform, but in vain.

"If my buildings mislike them, I confess my folly in the expenses, because some of my houses are to come, if God so please, to them that shall not have land to make them. I mean by my house at Theobalds: which was begun by me with a mean measure, but increased by occasion of her Majesty's often coming: whom to please I never would omit to strain myself to more charges than building is. And yet not without some special direction of her Majesty upon fault found with the small measure of her chamber, which was in good measure for me, I was forced to enlarge a room for a larger chamber.

"For my house in Westminster, I think it so old that it should not stir any; many having of later times built larger by far, both in city and country; and yet the building thereof cost me the sale of lands worth an 100*l.* by year, in Staffordshire, that I had of good King Edward. My house of Burghley is of my mother's inheritance; who liveth, and is the owner thereof, and I but a farmer: and for the building there, I have set my walls upon the old foundation. I trust my son shall be able to maintain it, considering there are in that Shire a dozen larger, of men under my degree." But there are many more passages in this letter not to be passed over, or at least in the postscript to it, which we must now transcribe.

"After that I had ended, though my letter doth and will serve me, yet I could not omit to answer a notable, absurd, manifest lie, which is, that Counsellors are forced to seek at my hands means for their suits. If it were considered how and upon whom, for these late years all manner of offices, good and bad, spiritual and temporal, have been bestowed, to whom the persons beneficed do belong, and whom they do follow, it will easily be judged how rare I do or have dealt therein. If great numbers be bestowed, and not one upon any kinsman, servant, or follower of mine, then how probable is it that I had ability to do that wherewith I am thus slandered? In very truth, I know my credit in such cases so mean, and others I find so earnest and able to obtain any thing, that I do utterly forbear to move for any; and therefore indeed I have few special friends, and so I find the want thereof.

"True it is her Majesty throweth upon me a burthen to deal in all ungrateful actions; to give answers unpleasant to suitors that miss; where others are used to signify pleasant answers affirmatively. For myself, I have not made nor obtained any suit from her Majesty these ten years. In my whole time I have not for these xxvi years been beneficed from her Majesty so much as I was within four years of King Edward. I have sold as much land in value as ever I had gift of her Majesty. I am at charges by attendance in Court; and by keeping of my household, especially in term times; by resort of suitors at more than any Counsellor in England. My fee for the treasurership is no more than it hath been these xxx years. And this I do affirm, that my fees of my treasurership do not answer to my charge of my stable (I mean not my table); and in my household I do seldom feed less than an hundred persons.—For my servants, I keep none to whom I pay not wages and give liveries, which I know many do not."

Such are the contents of one letter only, transcribed by Strype. The 2d, No. lix., enters rather further into the particulars of his administration, as regarded the affairs of Europe; and equally deserves to be read and considered, as a proof of the Treasurer's honest and honourable intentions. But, obscure maligners were not the only persons he had to deal with; Lord Leicester was continually jealous of him, and was rather suspected to be at the bottom of all the slanders of which we have spoken. Lord Burghley therefore did not omit to write to his Lordship also, ingenuously thanking him, in the names of his sons as well as himself, for many great attentions, but strongly intimating, that from the reports made to him,* he was no sincere friend. The letters that passed upon this occasion also, may be seen in Strype;† the letter of Lord Burghley to

* Lady Russell had reported some things spoken by Leicester of Lord Burghley.

† Nichols also has printed them in his Progresses, vol. ii. under the 1585.

Leicester is dated from Nonsuch, August 11, 1585; and ends, "your Lordship's as you shall please to have me, W. B." Leicester's reply is very long, and perhaps very deceitful, as some parts of it seem to shew;* but the reader may judge for himself. Leicester's letter is dated from Cornbury Park, Aug. 15, 1585. Leicester always knew how to act and write like a gentleman; and what is more, like a virtuous, pious, and agreeable gentleman; but a greater dissembler could not be. The Dutch were taken in by his appearance, as we shall have occasion to shew;—"Inerat vultu sermonique amœna quædam Majestas," even Grotius says of him, who had no disposition to praise either Lord Leicester himself, or his Sovereign, or his country.

BEFORE we enter upon the subject which may be expected more particularly to engage the attention of our readers, during the course of this year, two circumstances may require to be noticed. The Queen having calculated upon an immediate war with Spain, in consequence of the measures she was pursuing with the States of Holland, had sent out, in order to be beforehand with Philip in the commencement of hostilities, a Fleet of twenty-one ships, under the command of Sir Francis Drake,* to attack the Spanish possessions in America and the West Indies, where they were little likely to be expected, but whence it was not improbable they might be able to bring home great riches. How far this was consistent with the strict rules of war, we shall not stop to enquire, as the success was not great; (see however D'Ewes' Journal, 409.) some captures were made, and some booty acquired; valued at about 60,000*l.; with many pieces of ordnance, brass and iron. But a sad sickness prevailed during most of the time, amongst the men, to the loss of many hundreds; and the Fleet was finally dispersed by so violent a tempest, that the ships never came together again until they met in the English harbours, at the very beginning of this year. In the meantime an English adventurer, John Davis, made his first voyage in search of a passage to the East Indies by the North Seas, and which was twice afterwards repeated, but without the success he had been led to anticipate. The discovery of the straits leading into Baffin's Bay, between Greenland and America, which have since gone by his name, being in fact the principal if not the only important results of his several expeditions.

It was in the month of January or February of this year, that the Earl of Leicester entered upon his command in Holland. He had quitted England on the 8th of December, 1585, with a large Fleet and many distinguished persons in his train; and arrived at Flushing on the 10th, where he was received in great form by a son of the late Prince of Orange,† and his own nephew, Sir

* On his return home Sir Francis, having touched upon the coast of Virginia, so named in compliment to Elizabeth by Sir Walter Raleigh, who had begun to plant a colony there, was asked to bring home certain Englishmen, who have the credit of first introducing into this Kingdom the use of tobacco. Camden calls it tabacca, nicotia, or tobacco; wondering greatly at the taste of his countrymen, who could with such "insatiable desire and greediness suck in the stinking smoke through an earthen pipe, presently to blow it out again at their nostrils," strongly intimating that it was making barbarians of themselves; yet the rage for it was so great, that he adds, "tobacco-shops are now as ordinary in most towns as tap-houses and taverns."

The fashion of sucking into the mouth and blowing out at the nostrils the fumes of this Virginian weed, has, in the course of more than two centuries, had its fluxes and refluxes. Within our own time, we have known the smoking through earthern pipes exploded from all good companies, as an unbearable and offensive vulgarity; and the habit resumed again, in the shape of cigars, by persons who would resent nothing more than the slightest imputation of vulgarity.

† Maurice, the Prince's second son. His elder brother had been seized by the Duke of Alva, and forcibly sent, at the early age of thirteen, from the University of Louvain to Spain, where he was bred up in Popery, and kept as a prisoner there almost thirty years. Maurice had been elected on the death of his father, and, in consequence of the absence of his brother, Stadtholder and Captain General by sea and land, when only eighteen years of age, at which time he began to display great marks of genius and ability; he has generally been regarded as the proper founder of the Republic of Holland. Among the instructions given to Leicester by Elizabeth, one was, to pay especial attention to the sons of the late Prince of Orange. We cannot help noticing another instruction, as it probably might be traced to Lord Burghley's great care in such matters. He was directed to make himself acquainted with the method of raising and falling Philip Sidney, governor of the town; salutes of ordnance, bonfires, ringing of bells, and other rejoicings announcing his arrival.

As the States had upon a similar expectation, of effectual and powerful assistance from France, conspired to shew all possible honours to the Duke of Anjou,* so were they forward to confer as high distinctions on the English general; not only at every place where he stopped, were all manner of devices exhibited, to express the sense they had of the importance of his mission, but on his arrival at the Hague, he was desired by the States to accept the chief government and absolute authority over the confederated Provinces, with the title of Governor and Capta n General of Holland, Zealand, &c. He had "a noble guard," appointed to attend him; was "saluted of all men by the title of Excellency, and being," as Camden relates, "soothed up with flatteries, as seated in the highest and most illustrious degree of honour, he began to take upon him as if he had been a perfect king." But, as the same author writes, "the Queen taking it very ill that the States had conferred so large an honour on him, and that he had accepted it, nipped the man at unawares in his swelling pride, by one short letter."

The letter is indeed severe enough, but need not be transcribed.† Some however have questioned its sincerity;‡ as particularly, Bentivoglio and Struda;

the value of money in the States, that the soldiers might not receive their pay at one rate, and give it out at another.

* See a very long account of the honours paid to the Duc d'Anjou at Flushing, Middleborough, Ermwiden, Vere, Lillo, and Antwerp, 1581-2, in Nichols' Progresses of Queen Elizabeth. For a similar account of the distinctions conferred on Lord Leicester, see the Life of that nobleman, London, 1727.

† See Camden 327. Mr. Lodge, in his Illustrations of British History, in a note to a letter from Lord Leicester to Lord Shrewsbury, vol. ii. No. cci. fancies that Elizabeth, in pique and jealousy, merely designed to crush his popularity, but her motives were quite of a different description. She did not like to commit herself too far, as will be seen below. In the letter referred to, Leicester speaks of the Government put into his hands by the States, as forced upon him; as being a burthen too great for him to support, and little agreeable to his own desire, "if the service of her Majesty or benefit of his country were not to be preferred to every thing else."

‡ Mr. Turner, in his late account of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, is not only disposed to regard the letter as genuine and sincere, but to draw from it conclusions favourable to the Queen's character; thinking it impossible that she should have written in such a tone of high and elevated authority, to a man who had the power of charging her with any undue intimacy. We confess we have been more struck with a passage Mr. Turner himself cites just afterwards, from Sir Philip Sidney's famous letter to her in 1580, where he asks her, in reply to a remark of her own, who concur in the suspicion, that the Queen was inwardly pleased with the compliment, wishing to obtain the sovereignty of Holland, through Leicester. Nothing surely could be less probable. She had actually twice declined the sovereignty, though offered to her by solemn embassies,* and rather against the advice of her Parliament, who were willing to support her in such incidental charges as it might bring upon her, had she chosen to accept it; we are much more disposed to agree with Rapin, who supposes the trick, if there were any, to have been all on the other side; that the States designed to force the sovereignty upon her whether she would or no, that they might engage her farther in their defence than she intended; but that Elizabeth was too wise to be ensnared, being resolved to assume no power over them, that might oblige her to assist them, beyond what her own affairs would admit.†

As Elizabeth had remonstrated almost as strongly with the States themselves, as with Leicester, explanations became necessary, and in a short time things were settled more to her satisfaction.

expressive of a fear of falling into contempt with her subjects if she should not marry: "what is there within you that can possibly fall into the danger of contempt? Our minds rejoice with the experience of your inward virtues; our eyes are delighted with the sight of you." Such questions and remarks, from a man of Sir Philip's high spirit and character, and the nephew of Leicester, and upon the very subject of her marriage with the Duc d'Alençon, could scarcely be less than insult and mockery, if half the things attributed to Elizabeth by her enemies be true. At least we should think so; and we are the more inclined to notice it, because Lord Burghley himself was often led to express himself in terms equally exculpatory of the maiden Queen. Of her partialities, coquetry, and love of admiration, there could be no doubt; sufficient certainly to encourage the surmises of after-times; our own doubts refer rather to the serious opinions of her contemporaries. Among the reasons penned by Lord Burghley to move the Queen to accept the Archduke Charles, and against her marrying Leicester, one reason with regard to the latter, is, "it will be thought that the slanderous speeches of the Queen with the Earl be true." We can scarcely suppose that his Lordship really judged them to be true. But we had rather leave such points to be decided by others. Mr. Ellis has a short note upon the subject, 2d Series of Original Letters, vol. iii. 136. upon a particular occasion which certainly called for some remarks.

* See an account of the splendid entertainment of the Deputies of the States on their arrival in London 1585, in Nichols's Progresses, vol. ii. 437.

† There was very soon a suspicion that the charges of Leicester's expedition could not be maintained. "[Erl Lester]" says Lord Burghley in a letter to Sir Edward Stafford (Murdin, 570.) "is like to be revoked with a pretence to give counsel how the Queen shall further proceed in that action, which, for lack of money to maintain the charges, is not in small peril; a matter of the greatest consequence that can be here imagined." Leicester himself affirmed to Lord Burghley that he had lost 25,000*l.* by the expedition.

It would take us too much out of the line of our inquiries to enter into the history of Lord Leicester's government and campaigns in Holland this year; other historians will be found to have amply recorded all that passed there: he was far from giving satisfaction to those whom he went to assist, having soon offended them, both by his presumption and incapacity; so that towards the end of the year, he returned to England, * in order to devise some better measures to accomplish his purposes; having sustained, however, a very severe loss during the campaign, in the death of his nephew, Sir Philip Sidney. This celebrated man being wounded in a skirmish † before Zutphen, lived just long enough to close the short career of his very memorable life, by a display of fortitude, resignation, and calm submission to the will of Providence, which very justly entitled him to the many distinguished honours paid to his memory; ‡ as described at length by various authors. § "He died," says one of his particular

* Sir Robert Naunton has observed concerning Leicester's exploits in Holland, that his device might have been "veni, vidi, redii."

† Though it might be called a skirmish, as being no more than an attack of a convoy, Strada, de Bello Belgico, calls it "atrox atque perquam vehemens pugna," and indeed it was, as we read, usual afterwards to denote a severe conflict by comparing it "cum Zutphaniensi occursu." The death of Sir Philip Sidney is thus noticed by Thuanus: "Ea victoria unius Philippi Sidneii virtute, ingenii solertiâ, ac eruditione præstantis adolescentis clade obscurata est." Zutphen had been disgraced by some of the most oppressive acts of the Duke of Alva. Five hundred of the citizens who had surrendered having been cruelly massacred, and others driven into the river Issel, where their struggles were contemplated with the most unfeeling joy.—Watson's History of Philip II. Meteren speaks of Sir Philip's wound and death in much the same terms as Thuanus.

‡ Leicester is said greatly to have lamented his fall; "James, King of Scots," says Camden, "honoured him with an epitaph; both the Universities consecrated their tears, and New College in Oxford set forth a most elegant description of his noble acts."

§ Sir Philip had just before lost his father, Sir Henry Sidney, who died at the Bishop's Palace at Worcester, May 5, 1586, and was buried, with great pomp, at the family seat of Penshurst in Kent; three months after the decease of Sir Henry, his lady also died, the lady Mary Sidney, a most excellent and virtuous woman, as she is spoken of in Molineux's Continuation of Hollinshed. Sir Henry had been the companion and bosom friend of that accomplished Prince, King Edward VI., who, indeed, died in Sir Henry's arms, breathing out his soul in a fervent prayer to the Almighty, to have mercy on him. Sir Henry was in great favour after this with Mary, and his son Philip was even so named after her husband the King of Spain. We must refer the reader to other authors for the further history of this great and good man, who is allowed to have been "one of the most upright and ablest ministers of Elizabeth." His friendship with Lord Burghley began in Edward's reign; and it is remarkable, that when, in the year 1569, an overture was made, on the recommendation of Lord Leicester, for a marriage between the young Philip friends, "not languishing in idleness, riot, and excess, not as overcome with nice pleasures, and fond vanities, but of many wounds received in the service of his prince, in defence of persons oppressed, in maintenance of the only true Catholic and Christian religion, among the noble, valiant, and wise, in the open field, in martial manner, the honorablest death that could be desired, and best becoming a Christian knight, whereby he hath worthily won to himself immortal fame among the godly, and left example worthy of imitation to others of his calling."

For the particulars of his funeral, funeral honours, and of the many complimentary verses written on the occasion, we must refer the reader, after Collins, Lord Brooke, &c. to the Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Sir Philip Sidney, by Dr. Zouch, York, 1808; he died at the early age of thirty-two, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, November 16, 1586, with great pomp and celebrity, and entirely at the Queen's cost. Of his various talents and accomplishments, the following short compliment in Thomson's Seasons, may serve to convey a very just and very pleasing idea:

> "Nor can the muse the gallant SIDNEY pass,
> The plume of war! with early laurels crowned,
> The lover's myrtle, and the poet's bay."
> Summer, p. 1510.

As a patriot, we shall find him distinguished and commemorated byother modern poets, of no small fame.—See Mason's Isis, and Warton's Triumphs of Isis.*

Sidney, and Anne, eldest daughter of Sir William CECIL (afterwards Countess of Oxford), Sir Henry gave it his entire approbation; in a letter to Sir William, dated Feb. 24, 1569, he expresses his sorrow on observing a coolness in the proceeding, "where such good liking appeared in the beginning." "For my part," he adds, "I never was more ready to perfect that matter, than presently I am; assuring you for my part, if I might have the greatest prince's daughter in Christendom for him, the match spoken of between us, on my part, should not be broken." The match is supposed to have gone off in consequence of the tender age of the parties. When Sir Philip's foreign preceptor, the celebrated Languet, was giving him advice on his return to England, he counselled him to cultivate the acquaintance of Cecil: "Ubi in Angliam veneris, vide ut colas CECILIUM, qui est tui amans, et tibi reddit omnia familiaria;" and the more thoroughly to ingratiate himself with this great Statesman, he recommends it to him to love, or pretend to love his children. "Nullâ autem re ejus benevolentiam magis demereri poteris, quam si ejus liberos ames, aut saltem simules te amare." A plain proof of Cecil's love for his children, though the preceptor has justly incurred blame for the hint he gives of an accommodating dissimulation, in failure of the reality.—See Zouch's Life of Sir Philip Sidney, 74.

* Since writing the above, we have seen the account given of him in Mr. Turner's History of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in which many extracts are introduced from the poetical effusions of

We must now turn to consider the general state of Europe as introductory to the sad story of this year, the trial and condemnation of Mary Queen of Scots.

Bishop Burnet, in the history of his own times, speaks of five great crises into which the Protestant religion was brought in the course of the Reformation.* The first, the capture of the Duke of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse by Charles V. and breaking up of the Smalcaldic League. [See our first volume ch. xxxviii.] The second, towards the close of Mary's reign, when the Cardinals Lorrain and Granvelle combined to unite France and Spain for the extirpation of heresy; defeated by Mary's death and Elizabeth's accession. "The third crisis lasted," he goes on to say, "from 1585 to 1589; then began the league in France; the Prince of Parma was victorious in the Netherlands; the Prince of Orange was murdered; the States fell under great distractions; and Spain entered into a design of dethroning the Queen of England, and putting the Queen of Scots in her stead; in order to which they were for some years preparing the greatest fleet that the world had ever seen, which came to be called the INVINCIBLE ARMADA. All Europe was amazed at these great preparations, and many conjectures were made concerning the design of such a vast fleet; some thought of Constantinople, others talked of Egypt in conjunction with the Emperor of the Abyssynes; but that which was most probable was, that King Philip intended to make a great effort, and put an end to the war in the Netherlands in one campaign; at last the true intent of it was found out. Walsingham's chief spies were priests, and he used always to say, an active but

Sir Philip's contemporaries, and particularly from Mr. Todd's valuable edition of Spenser, to whom Sir Philip appears to have been the earliest patron, from the following lines, "Who first my muse did lift out of the floor,

"To sing her sweet delights in lowly lays."

And in the dedication of his "Ruins of Time," to the Countess of Pembroke, Sir Philip's Sister, he styles him "the hope of all learned men, and the patron of my young muses."

Of all his contemporaries, King James has the credit given him, by Lord Hardwicke, of having written the most elegant lines upon him, "worthy of a scholar of Buchanan."

* In Dr. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, &c., we have the following dates under the Era of the Reformation:

England (Wickliffe)	1360	Sweden (Petri)	1530
Bohemia (Huss)	1405	Ireland (Brown)	1535
Germany (Luther)	1517	England completed (Cranmer, Bucer, vicious priest was the best spy in the world; by one of these he had advice that the King of Spain had fixed on a resolution with regard to his fleet, but that it was not yet communicated to any of his ministers in foreign Courts. The King himself had indeed writ a letter about it to the Pope, but it was not entered in any office, so this was all that the intelligence from Madrid could discover; upon this one was sent to Venice, from whence the correspondence with Rome was held, and at Rome it was found out that one of the Pope's chief confidants had a mistress, to whom 20,000 crowns were given, for a sight and copy of that letter; the copy of it was sent over in 1586; in it the King of Spain had acquainted the Pope that the design of his fleet was to land in England, to destroy Queen Elizabeth and heresy, and to set the Queen of Scots on the throne: in this he had the concurrence of the house of Guise, and he also depended on the King of Scotland. This proved fatal to the Queen of Scots."

We shall not proceed farther with this extract at present, though there is much more to our purpose, and which will be brought forward in its proper place. The copy of the letter, indeed, is said not to have been received in England until after Christmas, in the winter of 1586, which was subsequent to Mary's trial; the designs of Spain were perhaps therefore only matters of suspicion until then, but of suspicion so strong, being fortified by other occurrences, as to justify the utmost vigilance on the part of the English Council. We may well suppose that the combination above had become sufficiently apparent, when the association was formed, and the celebrated act passed, which Mary herself regarded as her death-warrant. Leicester is supposed to have had a principal hand in this, and very possibly he had; but as to the severity of it, with regard to Mary, had her pretended friends looked only to her safety, they might, for a time at least, have desisted from their purposes; but it is impossible to deny, that every symptom of a great enterprise against England, seemed to increase, rather than abate, after the formation of the association and passing of the act*

* "This is the severest act," says Rapin, "against the Catholics in the reign of Elizabeth; but they could blame only themselves, or rather the indiscreet zeal of some amongst them, who never ceased plotting against the Queen, and endeavouring to set the Queen of Scots on the throne of England. Even this statute was not capable of stopping them; till at last they carried their zeal to such a height, that the destruction of one of the Queens became necessary for the preservation of the other."—Life and Reign of Elizabeth, [from Rapin,] vol. ii. 78. "Mary," it is added, "had not the prudence to renounce corresponding with those implicated in these plots, here or in foreign countries, nor quick-sighted enough to perceive that she only served for a blind to her pretended friends, to execute other projects."

referred to. That act, as plainly as possible, pointed out the danger into which Mary might be brought, by the continuance of the intrigues of the Jesuits and seminary Priests, and still more by the threats of Spain and France; but those intrigues and those threats appeared only to become daily more alarming, until, in the months of June and July, Babington's conspiracy was discovered, and many other devices of the same nature so thoroughly detected, as to leave no doubt on the minds of Elizabeth's Counsellors, that her life was in jeopardy; in hourly jeopardy indeed; nor should it be forgotten that their own lives were, in the very nature of things, in equal jeopardy. It was not the mere person of Elizabeth that was threatened, but her Crown and her Church. "Elizabeth and heresy," were to be overthrown, as the letter referred to states; and no doubt the whole body of Elizabeth's Counsellors, as the favourers and abettors of the proscribed heresy, must have been included in the proscription. It was not an age in which such proscriptions were to be disregarded, especially if they were known to derive their authority from either Spain, or France, or Rome. Neither Elizabeth nor her ministers could be expected to despise such denunciations to so great a degree, as to wait tamely to have their own throats cut, for defending what they could not without ignominy abandon. The Prince of Orange had too recently incurred the forfeitures of such a proscription, and fallen by the hand of a fanatic,* and the King of Navarre, and his brother the Prince of Condé, had been put upon the list of excommunicated Princes, as well as Elizabeth, by the new Pope, that very extraordinary man, Sixtus Quintus, who hated Philip II., admired the character of Elizabeth, and yet excommunicated the latter afresh, in order, for form-sake, to appear to sanction Philip's attack upon the dominions of a heretic!—See Walch's History of the Popes.

The letter above, upon the authenticity of which we rely no farther than as it stands confirmed by abundance of other historical documents, mentions many

* It is scarcely credible now, though it is exceedingly true, and has already been mentioned, but may bear to be repeated in such a work as the present, that in reward of the bloody deed committed upon this proscribed prince, Philip II. ennobled the family of the assassin. "Quelle étrange maniére d'acquerir la noblesse," is the remark of a less rigid Catholic. Mr. Turner has cited a passage from an intercepted letter of the Cardinal Granvelle, to the Provost Moriller, which plainly proves what participation his Eminence had in that foul crime; in blaming an agent who had been indiscreet in talking of the premeditated murder, he writes, "He can no more keep a secret than a woman. It is not a band imperial, but the king's: 25 or 30,000 crowns will be given to him, qui le donnera vif ou mort; c'est contre lui seul que l'on s'addresse; a recu argent pour faire depescher l'Orangier et est encores après."—Turner's Elizabeth, b. ii. ch. xxxi.

parties as in confederacy, or likely to be so soon, against England, Elizabeth, and her heretical church ; the Pope, the King of Spain, the Duke of Guise, and probably the King of Scotland. The last, therefore, remained, as it seems, to be brought over; and of this England was so much aware, that she lost no time in negotiating a treaty with him. James was open to one great temptation; namely, the offer of a subsidy or pension, a temptation applicable also to many of his needy courtiers. It is not to be wondered that, comparatively, and in the distracted state of that kingdom, they should be poor; and it was well worth Elizabeth's while to administer to such wants. If James could be retained on the side of England and Protestantism, it would have been the worst of all policy to leave him to become dependent on any of the Catholic powers, especially when they were known to be using every art to render him so. This, then, was one of the great transactions of this year. Though the French Ambassador in Scotland was doing all that he could do to hinder any league with England, Randolph, Elizabeth's very trusty envoy, prevailed, and a treaty of alliance and stricter amity between the two crowns was negotiated and signed, upon the principle that it was become necessary for all Protestant states to unite, for defence of the religion, against those who were notoriously known to be bound in a league to extirpate it, under the name of heresy.* This was the fair and very reasonable ground of negotiation on the part of England; but the French envoy, d'Esneval, would fain have persuaded James that Elizabeth's aim was only to secure herself from the attacks of those who were combined for the deliverance of Queen Mary; that it was a strange thing that he should think of uniting with a Queen who kept his mother in prison, against those who were labouring to free her from captivity; and he added, that the King his master could not but consider such a league [with England] as an express breach of the ancient alliance between France and Scotland.

It was a wise and, we think, a very true answer that James gave: namely, "that the Queen his mother's misfortunes proceeded wholly from her own friends, who, under colour of serving her, only aimed at executing their own projects."

We can conceive nothing to have been more true; for to refer again to Philip's letter to the Pope, we happen to know, that the House of Guise wished for Mary's deliverance, merely to thwart the views that the Bourbon's had upon the throne of France, in case of a vacancy; while Henry III., so far from being really anxious for the deliverance of Mary, heartily wished to prevent the House of Guise obtaining any such addition of power and influence;* and we happen to know besides, with a considerable degree of certainty, that Philip wished Mary out of the way, quite as much as Elizabeth could do. Never, surely, was there a greater conflict and opposition of interests, though Mary seemed to afford a plausible excuse to all who were against Elizabeth. Mary, very indiscreetly, by ciphers and other secret communications, rendered herself a party to all the attempts and confederacies against England. All this she acknowledged, pretending she only sought her freedom, but her false friends made her freedom the pretence for very different objects; objects tending rather to her death than her deliverance, as bringing the conflict and rivalry between her and Elizabeth for the crown of England, to a very formidable crisis; a crisis hastened, as it would seem, at this very time, by the Queen's determination to send forces out of the kingdom to the defence of Holland.

This was certainly the state of things, when Mary, on the 11th of October, 1586, was brought to her trial. But, before we proceed to consider the circumstances of her trial and sentence, we must observe, that our account of this too memorable year would probably have no end, if we were to aspire to the credit of being able to clear up all the difficulties of the case, to the general satisfaction of our readers. It is a case, we must grant, which it would be impossible now to explain to the satisfaction of any readers. Mary will always be an object of pity, and Elizabeth, in an almost equal degree, of censure and reproach; if not, indeed, of resentment and abhorrence. The former, besides, is allowed to have possessed many brilliant and ingratiating accomplishments; while the latter, though deservedly popular as a Princess of high and undaunted spirit, and the avenger of England against many proud foes, was undoubtedly deficient in some of the prime "charities of life," and softnesses of her sex; sadly spoiled besides, by the extravagant flattery and the general homage of a Court, in which the Queen's favour was the only point of union.†

* In a letter from Mary to Babington, July 12, 1586, produced at the trial, the following passage occurs: "Discover as little as you can, your names and intentions to the French Ambassador, now leiger at London, for although, as I understand, he is a very honest Gentleman, yet I fear his Master entertaineth a course far different from our designment, which may move him to discover us, if he had any particular knowledge thereof."—Cobbett's State Trials, i. 1180-1. In the Memoirs of Louis du Maurier, it is asserted that Henry III. prevailed upon Elizabeth to make away with Mary, their common enemy.—Koch's Revolution de l'Europe, ii. 118.

† To understand this, we must revert to what has been said elsewhere, as to the want of a proper responsibility on the part of Ministers in those days. There was no national appeal against

As it has been the fate of Lord Burghley, however, especially among that class of writers who have been distinguished as the avowed advocates of Mary, to participate with his Sovereign in all the abuse and reproach that has been cast upon her memory on this sad account, it must become us, as his biographers, to inquire as diligently, but as honestly as we can, how much of necessity, or rather self-defence, there was in the case; for this we regard as the only proper plea of justification, nor are we aware that any other was ever seriously urged, though it has been usual to represent both Elizabeth and Lord Burghley, as actually in combination together for a series of years, to harass, torment, and betray the Scottish Queen, upon motives so vile, so pitifully mean, so selfish and cruel, that if such charges deserved to be credited, we should not give ourselves the trouble of referring to the public records of the day to wipe away the reproach of such heavy imputations.

If the competition between the two Queens, fomented, encouraged, and abetted in every instance by Mary's foreign relatives and friends, was such as to render it almost impossible for Elizabeth not to harbour in her breast, at times, some strong feelings of private and strictly personal resentment, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that Cecil ever acted otherwise, or had occasion to act otherwise, than upon public motives; that he was constantly governed by the course of events, as they seemed to bear upon England, in a most remarkable struggle and competion between all the greater powers of Europe, from the moment of his birth, to the day of his death.* At the begin-the power and influence of the crown; if a Minister incurred the displeasure of his Sovereign, his fall was not only certain, but quite irrecoverable, except by concessions; which, in these days, would be accounted not only base and disgraceful, but contrary to the principles of the Constitution; according to which, a disgraced Minister often finds friends in his former adversaries and opponents, but it was not so in the sixteenth century; the crown could not only dismiss, but crush, and so divided in general were the Courtiers, that there were always some ready to avail themselves of, and to triumph in the disgrace of others. This led to the perpetual and general flattery of the Sovereign, so friendly to despotism. In these respects, Elizabeth was to be pitied, as a spoiled child, whose very whims and caprices were to be humoured, though, perhaps, in cases of great urgency, no one knew better how to bring her to a right mind than Lord Burghley; and partly through the discretion with which he took care to remonstrate and interfere, only where he judged it to be strictly necessary.

* It is the remark of Schiller, in his History of the Thiry Years' War, "that from the beginning of the religious war in Germany, to the peace of Munster, nothing great or remarkable happened in the world of Europe, in which the Reformation had not the principal share. All the important events which took place during this period were connected with the Reformation, if they did not originate from it; and every country, whether great or small, has felt its influence."

ning of our work we endeavoured to impress upon the minds of our readers, that we had found Lord Burghley's life to be so constantly mixed up (if we may so express ourselves) with the general affairs of Europe, that there were no means of separating them. It is to the transactions of Europe generally, that we have, throughout our history, been accustomed to look for an explanation of his conduct; and thither we would now particularly turn, to carry us through the mournful incidents of this remarkable period of his life; a period certainly the most fatal to his credit, in the estimation, we fear, not only of his decided enemies, but of others; who being generally friendly to his measures, as redounding to the honour, glory, wealth, and prosperity of England, have never, perhaps, found leisure sufficient to look so narrowly into the actual posture of affairs at this momentous time, as to be able to discern how much there was, as we hinted before, of real necessity in the events that in the course of this year, and the following, came to pass.

We need not, we conceive, go into the particulars of what has been denominated the Babington conspiracy, detected in the summer of this year; and which may be regarded as the determining cause of Mary's trial; as that, in short, which brought Elizabeth's Ministers to a clear decision, that it could not, with any safety to the kingdom, be longer deferred.* The probability of an almost immediate invasion was great; assassins appeared to be in requisition for the destruction of Elizabeth at the least, but by implication of the Ministers themselves, which might render the case one of private self-defence, if the public grounds of proceeding had been less clear. But as to the object of the detected conspiracies, to which Mary was undoubtedly privy, though she constantly asserted, that she looked only to that part of the project in hand, whatever it might be, which affected her own release, the following is the account given by Strype.

"The Papists," says he, "were very busy this year, in compassing three things; viz. raising a rebellion in England, killing the Queen, and delivering the Scottish Queen, and setting her up Queen of the realms." A few pages after, he adds a fourth object, namely, "to overthrow the established religion, and restore the abandoned religion of Popery."

* Leicester is said to have meditated the taking her off by poison, and to have sent a divine, privately, to Walsingham, to satisfy him that it was lawful.—Camden, 346. The author of the Life of Robert, Earl of Leicester, asserts, that he absolutely sent assassins to destroy her; having it in view, to bring the Earl of Huntingdon, who had married his sister, and was descended from the Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV., into the line of succession.

Those who can venture to doubt the truth of these imputations cast upon the Papists, at this particular crisis, must have read history with very different impressions from those which have affected our own minds. It may be almost necessary, perhaps, for us to affirm, that we believe them to be all true, without entering into the detail of confessions, intercepted letters, foreign intelligence, private and public communications, &c.; whereby the Queen's Counsellors were brought to the conclusion, that the removal of Mary, as a party to these conspiracies, and not merely as the most plausible object of them all, was the only step remaining to check the Papists in the course they were pursuing, of raising a rebellion, "killing or deposing Elizabeth,"* to make room for Mary, and thereby overthrowing the established religion (or rather the Protestant religion generally, for the Non-conformists among the Puritans were among the most obnoxious enemies of Rome), and restoring "the abandoned religion of Popery."

The history of the detected conspiracies may be read elsewhere,† but it should be thoroughly read, to qualify a person to judge properly of the threatened

* Rapin speaks of the time of Mary's death approaching, "The two Queens being no longer able to subsist together." "The Queen of Scots," he says, "was ever the stumbling-block. It was she that gave birth to all the contrivances." "Her life was the foundation of all the plots against Elizabeth, both at home and abroad."

† Camden introduces the subject of the Babington conspiracy in the following terms: "The same month that this league (with Scotland) was ratified, a dangerous conspiracy was discovered, against Queen Elizabeth. The original and progress whereof, I will lay down as briefly as I can out of the voluntary confessions of the conspirators themselves. In the English Seminary at Rheims, some there were, who, with a certain astonishment, admiring and reverencing the omnipotency of the Bishop of Rome, did believe that the bull of Pius Quintus, against Elizabeth, was dictated by the Holy Ghost. These men persuaded themselves, and others that eagerly desired and itched after the glory of martyrdom, that it was a meritorious act to kill such princes as were excommunicated; yea, that they were martyrs who lost their lives upon that account." We cannot help adding, that Gerard, who murdered the Prince of Orange, "chef des hérétiques rebelles," as he called him, declared that he had determined to do so, for the space of six years. "Et pourquoi?—Pour expier ses péchés, et pour meriter la gloire eternelle"—"ce fanatique mourut," says the same writer, "comme un martyr."—He had ingratiated himself with the prince, by pretending to be a zealous Protestant, always having a Psalter or the New Testament in his hands—"Qui auroit pu imaginer," (to continue the account given of him, in the work we are citing;) "qu'un exterieur si pieux cachat le cœur d'un monstre? Tout le monde fut la dupe de son hypocrisie." It seems to have been a fanatic of the same stamp (Savage) that was at first pitched upon at this time to destroy Elizabeth; but Babington, not willing to rely on a single person, proposed to have six engaged by a vow to that effect.—Compare Hume.

dangers against which Elizabeth and her ministers had to protect themselves:* nor was any time to be lost; for it seems to have been decided by those who meditated an invasion of the kingdom merely to set Mary on the throne, that Elizabeth must be first dispatched, to give them any hopes of a speedy success. Philip could have afforded to wait a little longer; until he was better prepared, in short, to crush the rebellion in Holland, overpower Elizabeth, and if Mary should fall in the struggle, ascend the throne of England himself; as a competitor for which, Mary was regarded by him as the only legitimate obstacle—a secret which that unfortunate Princess herself disclosed upon her trial. Being charged with a plot to convey the kingdom of England to Philip: "The Spaniard himself," she said, "laid claim to the kingdom of England, and would not give place to any title but hers."—[Camden, 356.] She little suspected the real danger she incurred from this very circumstance, for many Catholics, despairing of the restoration of Popery, either through Mary or her son, were urging Philip to assert his claims, at any risk to Mary, whom, if the truth were known, they rather wished out of the way. This is not said at random; Camden supplies us with an authority for it. Speaking of the bad advice Mary received from some of her pretended friends: "For the Jesuits," says he, "when they saw no hope remaining of restoring the Romish religion, either by her or her son, betook themselves to new stratagems, and began to forge a new and pretended title to the succession of the kingdom of England for the Spaniard (whose grandeur alone they laboured to increase). To this end, they sent into England (as Pasquier saith) one Samier (if the name be not counterfeit), a man of their society, to draw noblemen and gentlemen to the Spaniard's party, and thrust her forward to her own danger,† by telling her, that if she were troublesome, neither

* Babington was a young man of birth and education, who had become acquainted in France with Morgan, a late servant and pensioner of Mary, and the Bishop of Glasgow, her minister. By their means he appears to have been recommended to the Queen of Scots, who is held to have written to him several letters; and through him to have communicated with Morgan, till put under the more strict keeping of Sir Amias Poulet, "a mere Leicesterian," as Babington called him, and "a bitter enemy of the Catholic religion." Of Babington's confederates, Camden has given a full account. See also Mr. Turner's recent history of the reign of Elizabeth.

† It was, in fact, a very sure way of thrusting her forward to her own danger, and accelerating her end; for many of Elizabeth's Catholic subjects, who might wish well to Mary, were by no means so likely to be forward in helping Philip to the throne; and indeed we shall soon see, that after Mary's death, some Catholics were among the very foremost to defend England and Elizabeth against the Spaniard. This very circumstance, therefore, connected Elizabeth's security in a different way, with Mary's fall; and may well account for Burnet's remark, that "Mary lost her she nor her son should reign; and by exciting the Guises, her kinsmen, to new attempts against the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé, that being engaged therein they might not be at leisure to help her.*

If then we are to conclude that Elizabeth's ministers were in possession of this information, of which there appears to be little or no doubt, for they seem by some means or other to have known every thing, it must have been very plain to them, that if Mary waited for Philip's invasion, both Queens might be sacrificed; and if they did not as speedily as possible check, or defeat, the other enterprise, which seemed only to await the transportation of the army under Leicester into Holland, and in which the assassination of Elizabeth was regarded as a preliminary, Elizabeth might become the victim of the struggle, and that with her might fall every thing that had been established on her accession (and continued during a peaceable and popular reign of twenty-eight years), in Church and State, with an overwhelming and irrecoverable destruction.

If it were possible to suppose that there had really ever subsisted that sisterly, confidential, and cordial affection between the two Queens, of which so much is said in their royal communications, and of which we are sorry to say there occurs a good deal in the course of Mary's defence at her trial, we might lament the last struggle to which they were exposed, and which seemed to require the positive sacrifice of one, however revolting to the feelings of the other, but we cannot pretend to be the dupes of any pretended cordiality on life in consequence of Philip's preparations;" designed more to serve himself than her, and yet, in either case, to the dethronement of Elizabeth.

* Pasquier, the author whom Camden cites, was not only a contemporary of Lord Burghley, but very nearly of the same age, being born in 1528; he had a great horror of the Jesuits, even in those early days, observing, that they were in no case to be trusted; in pleading against them in favour of the University of Paris, he concluded his speech with declaring, that, in his opinion, this new Society, "cette nouvelle Societé de Religieux, qui se disoient de la compagnie de Jesus, non seulement ne devoit point être aggregée au corps de l'Université, mais qu'elle devoit encore être bannie entiérement, chassée et exterminée de France." If this were the character of the Society in the 16th century, in a Catholic kingdom, surely the Ministers of Elizabeth, a Protestant and proscribed Queen, had good reason to look after them, when they meddled with the affairs of England. Pasquier had three wives, and in a Latin Epigram, of his own composing, he acknowledged to have married the first, propter opus; the second, propter opes; and the third, propter opem. In estimating the character of the Jesuits, at that period, though perhaps equally applicable to them at all times, Lord Bacon's remark is exceedingly good. "Although in regard of their superstition, I may say, Quo meliores, eo deteriores, yet in regard of their learning, &c., I may say, as Agesilaus said to his enemy Pharnabasus, Talis quum sis, utinam noster esses."

either side. On the contrary, we are strongly inclined to think that Mary never liked (we need not say loved) Elizabeth any better than Elizabeth liked Mary; and though it has been the fashion to fancy that Mary never could have been so relentless a persecutor of Elizabeth, had she fallen into her power, as Elizabeth is judged to have been of Mary; yet we cannot but declare, that from some traits in Mary's character, we are by no means certain that Elizabeth would have experienced greater clemency. We must confess, that we are at all events quite astonished, that Mary should have lived so long, had Elizabeth, or even her Ministers, been really actuated by the foul spirit so often attributed to them; to all, she must have been a perpetual cause of disquietude, and to Elizabeth a great expense, as well as a trouble; and we all know, that expense was to the latter a very serious concern.

It is usual to talk of the heavy restraint put upon Mary; any restraint must have been painful, and to an independent Queen almost intolerable; yet we are disposed to think this has been greatly exaggerated;*—at all events, she found means to evade the utmost vigilance of Lord Shrewsbury, and to have been able, by her own account, and by the means of cyphers, to communicate continually, but secretly, with France, Spain, and her adherents in Scotland. She had always candidly declared to Elizabeth, she would use what means she could of interesting her foreign friends in her deliverance, and she seems, to that end, to have never failed to correspond with Elizabeth's bitterest foes; we have, in short, no doubt ourselves, but that she was privy to all that was in preparation this year for the overthrow of Elizabeth, with all its consequences; had she herself escaped, we could not have been sorry for it, but we do thoroughly think, that Elizabeth, as Queen of this Protestant country, deserved in every way to be protected and defended against the horrible combination that was formed against her.

* Even under her last and most strict keeper, Sir Amias Poulet, she seems to have taken the amusement of hunting. In the intervals between the departure of Lord Shrewsbury and the coming of Sir Amias, she was in the custody of Sir Ralph Sadler, who had his hawks and falconers at Tutbury, and whom Mary occasionally accompanied, to the distance of two or more miles from the castle. There is an angry letter of hers extant, giving a very horrible account of her abode at Tutbury; but it should be remarked when this letter is cited, that Elizabeth expressed great displeasure, that it was not made more ready for her, nor was she prevented making numerous demands, through Sir Ralph, for such things as she needed; and Sir Ralph, in his letter, on their first arrival at Tutbury, had expressly written, "she liketh her own lodging here well;" we believe at best it was bad enough, but certainly a great disposition was manifested to render it better. One of her requests from this very place, was to have her stud of horses continued to the number of sixteen, a large number for a secluded prisoner; we are persuaded that she had more attentions shewn her, than her particular advocates would have the world believe; we can excuse her angry representations, but things need not be made worse than they really were. Very early after her residence in England, Elizabeth had to complain of very gross misrepresentations upon this head, as may be seen in her instructions to Sir Henry Norris, her ambassador at Paris, to be seen in Digges. Some passages in this important paper are very curious.

God forbid that we should be expected to justify the course of proceedings against Mary, when it came to be determined that she should be exposed to trial; we are not prepared, for instance, to justify any violation of so reasonable a law, as that the witnesses as well as the accusers should be confronted with the accused; we are not prepared to justify the admission of accusers to the judicial bench; but as to the latter, we cannot help observing that it was a common error in the judicial proceedings of those times, now happily corrected. In the reign of Edward VI., who, we might ask, was the principal accuser of the Lord Seymour, but his own brother the Protector, urged on by that wicked man Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland? yet Warwick and Somerset both sat as judges; who was the accuser of Somerset himself afterwards, but the same Duke of Northumberland, yet he sat as a judge upon the trial. We might go farther, and ask who was selected to preside in the trial of Northumberland, for his attempt to set aside Mary, but the Duke of Norfolk, whom Northumberland had held prisoner, and who had actually been put under further restraint, during the short reign of Queen Jane, to further his purposes, according to the testimony of Noailles, the French Ambassador?

Rapin, as is probably well known, calls Lord Burghley, and Sir Francis Walsingham, "known enemies to the Queen of Scots," and thinks, they should have been "excluded from the list of judges, as Counsellors whom the Queen must have been swayed by, in bringing Mary to trial." As to Lord Burghley's 'known enmity," the best account that can be given of it, is from his own words, at the trial: when Mary challenged him, as well as Sir Francis Walsingham, as being her enemy, "Say rather," said Lord Burghley, as some report it, "I am an enemy to all Queen Elizabeth's adversaries." Sir Francis Walsingham's defence is still more striking: "I call God," said he, "to witness, that as a private person, I have done nothing unbeseeming an honest man; nor as I bear the place of a public person, have I done any thing unworthy of my place. I confess, that being very careful for the safety of the Queen and realm, I have curiously searched out the practices against the same; if Ballard had offered me his help, I should not have refused it; yea, I would have recompensed the pains he had taken; if I have practised any thing with him, why did he not utter it to save his life?" surely this must be regarded as the speech of an upright, faithful, and honourable servant of the Crown. We must, however, at the same time, give Mary the credit of a most dignified reply. "With this answer," says Camden, "she said she was satisfied: she prayed he would not be angry, that she had spoken freely what she had heard reported; and that he would give no more credit to those that slandered her, than she did to such as accused him; that spies were men of doubtful credit,* which dissemble one thing and speak another; and that he would in no sort believe that she had consented to the Queen's destruction;" and now again, adds the historian, she burst forth into tears: "I would never, said she, make shipwreck of my soul, by conspiring the destruction of my dearest sister."

It was answered by the lawyers, that this should soon be disproved by testimony.

We have been rather inadvertently induced to notice some passages of the trial; of which we have no need to give any very circumstantial account, as it is to be read at length in Camden and in the Collection of State Trials. Camden, indeed, is regarded as the principal writer upon the subject, and the only regular reporter of the Trial. Rapin would insinuate that his account is to be received with caution.†

As soon as the trial was determined upon, Lord Burghley, who had more to do with it officially than he appears to have at all liked,‡ determined to take the opinion of lawyers and civilians, whose decisions upon the case may be seen

* There can be very little doubt but that Mary was right in this, and that spies must be always men of doubtful credit, but still they may be necessary to detect secret conspiracies. "Those who take upon them such an office," says Rapin, "of what religion soever they be, are not usually the most honest men; but the behaviour of the Catholics (he is speaking of the year 1584) had made these precautions necessary; the knowledge of what passed among them being of the utmost consequence to the Queen." † See Life and Reign of Elizabeth, vol. ii. 150.

‡ It plainly appears, from the correspondence of Popham, the Attorney-General, with Lord Burghley before the trial, that the latter wished to have been absent, if he could have settled it so. In a letter addressed to Sir Edward Stafford in France, a few days only before the trial commenced, he writes: "I was never more toiled than I have been of late, and yet am, with services that here do daily multiply; and whosoever scapeth, I am never spared. God give me his grace." —Murdin, 570.

in Strype; but which we do not think it necessary to transcribe; so particular however was he, in having these opinions preserved and recorded, for the consideration and examination of after-ages, that the greatest care, it seems, was taken, to have them written out as fair as possible. [Strype, iii. 527.] The formality of the proceedings was certainly intended to impress the public at the time, as well as posterity, with the idea that every thing was conducted according to the rules of justice, though it is exceedingly certain, that many things took place very contrary to our own purer and more correct measures of jurisprudence. The unhappy Queen defended herself well, and conducted herself with great dignity, but as the whole of her defence consisted in denying what others had alleged against her, and in demanding evidence, which she knew could not be produced, from the caution with which things had been carried on, it seems impossible to admit, that she stood so clear as she pretended to be of the offences laid to her charge; particularly of having carried on a correspondence with Babington, though indeed, as she affirmed, she had never seen the man, nor sent letters in her own hand-writing, the production of which she said was necessary to her conviction. Those who have written the history of her martyrdom, as it has been called, have not been able to deny the fact of such a correspondence, and which the conspirators seemed generally to confess; hereby this unfortunate woman did certainly afford a handle to those who had the protection of Elizabeth and the Protestant government at heart, to regard the life of the one Queen as incompatible with the life of the other; while in respect to the Protestant Government, as it was very soon afterwards observed in the house of Commons, "Popery was certainly the chief and principal root of all these conspiracies, and the Queen of Scots a principal branch issuing from that root, and the most perilous and full of poison of all the other branches thereof, for that the Papists in very deed, for the most part not knowing the person of the said Queen of Scots, did wish the establishing of her in the crown of this realm rather in respect of Popery which she would set up, than for any affection they bore to her person, and so likewise for the most part all of them did either wish or could easily bear the death of her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, though perhaps they would not shew themselves to be actors or dealers therein."*

It is altogether a most melancholy story; but as Lord Burghley had notoriously so great a concern in it, we cannot possibly turn away from it, to the hazard of leaving him without such vindication as the case may seem to admit, or allowing impressions to remain on the minds of our readers, that in truth we think him guilty of all that has been laid to his charge by the avowed advocates of Mary. What cannot be altogether defended, may yet, by dint of inquiry, be so accounted for as to shift much of the blame that has been heaped upon the individuals concerned, on the very extraordinary circumstances in which those individuals were placed. Some of Rapin's reflections upon the trial and condemnation of Mary answer so exactly to our own view of the case, that we cannot possibly refrain from transcribing them. The trial took up several days of the month of October; and on the 25th, the Commissioners, who had, on the last day of the trial, adjourned the meeting from Fotheringay Castle to the Star Chamber, delivered their sentence, by which Mary was pronounced guilty of having been privy to the conspiracies on foot, tending to the hurt, death, and destruction of the royal person of her Majesty the Queen of England; and of compassing and imagining divers matters tending to the same issue, " contrary to the form of the statute in the commission aforesaid specified."

The wording of this sentence, as well as the very recent statute referred to, may help to explain the following very able remarks of Rapin.*

" It is hardly to be questioned, that Mary's death was determined when Elizabeth and her Council resolved to have her tried by Commissioners. But it must not be imagined their intention was to punish her for attempting the life of Elizabeth. If that had been all, they never would have proceeded to extremities, but would doubtless have been satisfied with putting it out of her power to contrive any such plots for the future, which would have been easy, by confining her more closely; but it was not so easy to hinder the Pope, the King of Spain, the House of Guise, the English Catholics, the Irish, the Scottish male-contents from considering her as a Princess to whom of right belonged the two crowns of England and Scotland, and from using their continual endeavours to restore her to the throne of Scotland, and place her on that of England, even in Elizabeth's lifetime; though she had been so closely confined that she could not herself have been concerned in these plots, it could not have prevented her friends

* We copy from a work intitled The History of the Life and Reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 2 vols. 8vo., London, 1740. Upon comparing it with Rapin, we have generally found them so entirely to agree, as to induce us to think that they are, in most parts, the same.

from acting in her favour. Nothing, therefore, but her death could break their measures, and put an end to the plots which were daily framing on her account. So it might with truth be said, that as Elizabeth's death was Mary's life, so Mary's death alone could preserve Elizabeth, and with her, liberty and the Protestant religion in England; but as it was not likely Mary, who was the younger, should depart first out of the world by a natural death, recourse was to be had to violence, that the Queen and the realm might be freed from their imminent danger. The share Mary had in Babington's conspiracy, and which probably was greater than what Camden intimates, was not therefore the cause of Mary's condemnation, but the pretence used to be rid of a Queen on whose life Elizabeth's adversaries built all their hopes. It is therefore Mary's own friends that occasioned her misfortune, by serving her too zealously, or rather by making her their instrument to execute their grand projects against the Protestant religion. The Pope flattered himself with restoring, by her means, the Catholic religion in England; and the English Catholics looked upon her as the only person that could free them from the intolerable yoke of a Protestant government. Philip II. saw no other way to subdue the Netherlands. In short, the House of Guise, whose ambitious projects are well known, thought to find in her an infallible means to crush the Hugonots of France, who supported the title of the lawful heir to the crown of that kingdom."*

We cannot avoid making a pause here, not so much to correct the politics of Rapin, as to add a little to their complexity, as bearing upon the politics of England, and Mary's sad fate.

The Pope would probably have liked well enough to have had the Catholic religion restored in England through Mary, but not so well through Philip, especially if there were any likelihood of his obtaining the Crown of England, by anything happening to Mary, for it is well known that Sixtus Quintus hated Philip, and for the mere sake of humbling him, wished rather even to keep upon good terms with Elizabeth, so that after the death of Mary had really taken place, it has been observed, that he looked on her beheading with eyes very different from those of a zealous Pope; and the English Catholics, through the very same hatred and dread of Philip, chose rather (Mary being gone) to bear the Protestant yoke, than change it for the Catholic yoke of the proud Spaniard. Again, Philip's object was not so much to subdue the Netherlands as, after recovering them, to subdue England, and for himself, through certain friends that he had in England, and who had cast off all hope of gaining their ends through Mary; but this was not the case with the English Catholics generally. Finally, as to the House of Guise, their hopes of crushing the Hugonots through Mary, and eventually putting aside the claims of Henry of Navarre to the throne, so much offended and disquieted their Sovereign Henry III., that, as we have before shewn, upon the testimony of a foreign writer, he rather took part with Elizabeth against Mary as a common enemy. Having added these few remarks to those of Rapin upon the affairs of Europe, we shall proceed with his very excellent reflections.

"Mary herself gave too much countenance to all these plots; she was so imprudent, as, being a prisoner, incessantly to confound two things, which could well have been distinguished and separated—I mean her liberty, and her title to the Crown of England; she thereby gave Elizabeth occasion to confound them too, and to ruin her, in order to preserve her own life and crown.

"These were the real motives of Mary's condemnation; if we consider them politically, they may be said to be good and necessary; but it happens very frequently, that policy is repugnant to justice and equity. Upon this condemnation it is that Elizabeth's enemies (and it might be added, Lord Burghley's) have triumphed, and, indeed, it is a fit subject for rhetoric; but if it be considered who they were that exclaimed the loudest against Elizabeth, they will be found to be the very persons who would have murdered her to set Mary on the throne of England. Had they suceeeded in their design, would their deed have been more just, or more agreeable to the precepts of the Christian religion? doubtless, it would, were the thing to be tried by the principles of the adversaries to Elizabeth and her religion. But if it were allowed by the laws of religion, justice, and equity, to take away the life of Elizabeth, in order to set Mary on the throne, and restore the Catholic religion in England, was it less allowable for the English to put Mary to death, in order to preserve their Queen and religion from the destruction they were continually threatened with? let us say rather, these maxims are equally blameable, and repugnant to the rules of the Gospel, to whatever party they are applied.

"Having seen the real motives of Queen Mary's condemnation, there is no great cause to wonder at the irregularities to be observed in her trial. The point was not so much to punish her for her part in the plot, as to satisfy the public that she was concerned in it; that her condemnation might be thought the less strange, or rather absolutely necessary for the safety of England. The Queen and Council believed that they had sufficient evidence, that Mary was acquainted with the conspiracy, had consented to it, and promoted the execution to the utmost of her power; this sufficed for their design, they knew the people would easily excuse some irregularities in an affair which concerned their own preservation."

We cannot refrain from continuing this extract somewhat farther:—

"Since, therefore, Mary's condemnation can be considered only as the effect of Elizabeth's policy, it is in vain that the following queries are put concerning her trial. I. What authority had Elizabeth over her? II. Whether Mary could be considered as subject to the laws of England, under colour that she had lived there eighteen years, being a prisoner? III. Whether it could be said she had enjoyed during the time the protection of the laws, and be thence inferred, she ought to be liable to them? IV. Whether, even upon such a supposition, she had enjoyed, in her trial, the benefit of the laws of England? V. Whether she was tried by her Peers, according to the constant and immutable privilege of the English? VI. Who could be her Peers? VII. Whether Elizabeth's commission was according to law? VIII. Whether the formalities requisite in a trial of this nature were observed? IX. Whether she can be said to have been legally convicted, by the testimony of persons that were dead, and whom it lay in Elizabeth's breast to keep alive and bring face to face? X. Whether the evidence of her Secretaries, who were still alive, could be deemed valid, without being confronted, contrary to express acts of Parliament? XI. Whether a captive Queen's consent to the invasion of a kingdom where she is unjustly detained, is a crime worthy of death? XII. Whether the letters in cipher writ by her Secretaries, were a sufficient proof that the whole contents were known to her? XIII. Supposing she had given a full and entire consent to the plot, whether the manner of her being detained in England, her long confinement, the loss of her kingdom, procured partly by Elizabeth's secret practices, did not merit that her crime should be reckoned of a different nature from that of a subject, who conspires against his Sovereign? I do not think it possible to vindicate Elizabeth upon each of these queries; we must, therefore, keep to the necessity she was under of destroying Mary to save herself, and justify her by the natural law of self-preservation, the only one that can be pleaded in her favour."

This is, indeed, the best excuse that can be alleged in vindication of Queen Elizabeth. Accordingly, Dr. Welwood observes, " that every day produced some new conspiracy against the life of Queen Elizabeth, and that, in most of them, the Queen of Scots was concerned, either as a party, or the occasion. Queen Elizabeth was put under a fatal necessity of either taking off the Queen of Scots, or of exposing her own person to the frequent attempts of her enemies." Du Maurier also expressly says, " that Queen Mary was the cause of her own ruin, by her restless temper, and her repeated designs against Queen Elizabeth's life: for Queen Mary's friends would never suffer her to be quiet, but were eternally plotting and contriving, bribing and conspiring, how to murder Queen Elizabeth, and to set up the Queen of Scots in her stead, to restore their beloved Popery here in England."

The whole of this account agrees so much with our own view of the subject, that we have nothing more to say. We have been desirous of repeating the *queries (which the author thinks are needless), because they will, we know, be judged by many to relate quite as much to Lord Burghley as to Elizabeth, and perhaps more, since he seems to have arranged every thing with the Attorney and Solicitor General previous to the trial; and, after the trial, to have been the person chosen to open the business to the House of Lords, upon the summoning of the Parliament for the express purpose: it being found expedient to call it together previously to the day to which it had been originally prorogued. It was on the 29th of October that it met, instead of the 14th of November, the day originally fixed; and, to take the account of Sir Simon D'Ewes, as it is to be found in his Journal, it was assembled on purpose to review the proceedings against the Queen of Scots, whose trial and attainder he twice calls most just and honourable. That it appeared so to him, therefore, cannot be doubted, yet, we must confess, we had much rather waive all unnecessary inquiries into that part of the subject, and resolve it all, with Rapin and Welwood, into a case of self-preservation and state necessity. The opinions of those, however, who were in the way of passing their judgment upon it at the time, ought certainly to outweigh any modern opinions, formed more than two centuries after the transactions, and greatly liable to be disturbed by the extraordinary interest the subject is known to have excited in all sensible and feeling minds; but especially since the appearance of certain books, written expressly on the side of Mary, to exonerate her, not only from all charges of a criminal nature, but, as it would seem, from all charges of a moral nature, and to represent her to have been altogether as pure,* as faultless, as amiable, and as beneficent, as, in the estimation of these writers, her judges and accusers, and her great rival, Elizabeth, were otherwise.

* We must again refer to Mr. Turner's account, which we had not seen when the above was written. Those who are at all aware how impossible it is for any two writers of history, unknown to each other, and in distant places, to examine exactly the same books, or draw their conclusions from exactly the same premises, will be disposed to allow for the satisfaction we have derived from finding that, in the view we have taken of this disastrous affair, as the biographers of Lord Burghley, we have, as to the main facts, the full concurrence of so diligent and able an historian as Mr. Turner; and, as a subsequent corroboration (as to us it really is), of the impartial decision of our own judgment on the case, we very anxiously refer to it. More especially as Mr. Turner has gone farther than we could presume to do into the question of the legality of the proceedings adopted. There is, in the British Museum, a curious MS. written by George Puttenham, " To the service of her Majesty, and for large satisfaction of all such persons, both princely and private, who, by ignorance of the case, or partiality of mind, shall happen to be ignorant, or not well satisfied in the said cause," viz. of Mary Queen of Scots. It is written learnedly, and intended to prove not only the legality of her detention, but of her condemnation and execution: her treason against Elizabeth being in the highest degree of læsa Majestas; but we do not apprehend that his arguments would be generally accounted valid.

The trial over, and the sentence passed, the approval and execution of that sentence rested, as it would appear, with the Parliament and the Queen. The Lords and Commons were expected to decide upon the proofs adduced on the trial, the justice of the sentence, and finally upon the necessity of carrying that sentence into execution; and, certainly, to read the many reasons adduced by the Speaker of the House of Commons, whereby he sought to persuade the Queen to execute the sentence, might incline the most sceptical to believe that the dangers represented as likely to ensue, from allowing Mary to live, were so indisputable, as to gain easy credit with the public at large, at least as far as is set forth in the first three short articles, viz. 1. "Your Majesties person cannot any while be safe." 2. "The religion cannot long endure among us." 3. "The most flourishing present state of this realm must shortly receive a woeful fall," i. e. in case execution of the sentence be not done.

* There are, in the possession of Lord Bagot, some very curious letters, written principally by Sir Amias Poulet to his Lordship's ancestor, Mr. Richard Bagot, as a Magistrate for the county of Stafford, commissioned, with others, by the court, to provide for the supply and defence of the castles of Tutbury, Fotheringay, &c. during the last years of Mary's confinement. On the back of one of those letters, in a hand-writing to all appearance of the same age and date, are four Latin verses, which, to say the least, give no very favourable views of the moral character of Mary; and strongly incline us to believe that those who have attempted to depreciate the character of Elizabeth, by too highly extolling that of her rival, have gone contrary to the opinions entertained of both, by the generality of their contemporaries. The verses certainly need not be transcribed; we mention them only as a sort of collateral proof that Mary's reputation did not suffer so much as some would pretend, from merely fabricated and malicious charges. In the above verses, the name of Messalina is applied to the Scottish Queen, intending, we apprehend, a comparison, not with the wife of Claudius of that name, but with her who married Nero, her former husband's murderer, Statilia Messalina. The verses, however, we are sorry to say, would apply to either.

Had the speaker stopped here, he would have said sufficient to make out the case of self-preservation, on which alone we should wish to rest our cause as the biographers of Lord Burghley, who seems to have been anxious to give as much publicity to the proceedings as possible, not like a man who sought to evade, but rather to submit the case to the judgment of posterity; not foreseeing, perhaps, that a more enlightened posterity might look more to the irregularities of the legal processes, than to the urgency of the case. As to those processes, however, it is exceedingly certain, that, as far as Lord Burghley was concerned, the trial, sentence, and execution of Mary were severally submitted to the judges and great law officers of the Queen, to the ablest civilians, and finally, to the Parliament, as we have shewn;* so that if it were such a deliberate murder as the partisans of Mary pretend, the whole nation ought to share the blame with Elizabeth and her great Minister, who, after all, we believe to have been at variance upon the subject, as we shall endeavour to shew under the year when the sad and heavy sentence was actually executed.

The speaker's reasons for pressing upon the Queen the necessity of putting the sentence in execution are many, and are printed by D'Ewes, from a memorial in his (the speaker's) own hand-writing; nor does D'Ewes himself scruple to call them "excellent and solid reasons;" and we trust that they were really thought so at the time, considering that they, in fact, decided the fate of the unhappy Queen of Scots, and that as a case of national and political self-preservation, and not of idolatry, as some of the reasons would imply, and which must have been plainly suggested by certain who had drunk deep of the springs of Geneva; wishing to persuade the Queen to be careful of shewing mercy, least she should incur the displeasure of the Almighty, as Saul had done by sparing Agag, and Ahab by sparing Benhadad. These Helvetian principles, if we may call them so, were surely unnecessary as stimulants. They mark indeed the horror and dread with which some viewed the possibility of a return to Popery, and of the reign of a second Mary; but the real question, we trust, was a very different one; if not, Elizabeth might be judged to have spared Mary too long, and to have already incurred the displeasure of Heaven for not having before followed the advice of her Commons, when, upon similar grounds, they would have hastened the measures now at last resorted to. If from the arguments and reasons thus alluded to, we separate those that may be said to represent the matter as a case of state necessity, there certainly are many very striking and cogent, and, as it seems to us, from what we know of the history of the times, exceedingly true. We will, with as much brevity as possible, transcribe a few of the heads.

* In this Parliament, the Queen did not choose to make her appearance; but was represented by three Commissioners, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Treasurer, and the Lord Steward, the Earl of Derby.

"Both she (the Q. of Scots) and her favourers think that she hath right, not to succeed, but to enjoy your crown in possession.

"She affirmeth it lawful to move invasion: therefore, as of invasion victory may ensue, and of victory the death of the vanquished, so doth she not obscurely profess it lawful to destroy you.

"She is greedy of your death, and preferreth it before her own life; for in her late direction to some of her complices, she willed, whatsoever became of her, the tragical execution should be performed on you.*

"There is by so much the more danger to your Majesty's person since the sentence than before, by how much it behoveth them that would preserve her or advance her, to hasten your death now or never, before execution done upon her; as knowing that you and none else can give direction for her death; and that by your death the sentence hath lost the force of execution, and otherwise they should come too late, if they take not the present opportunity to help her.

[There was certainly so much truth in this, as to induce us very strongly to believe that Elizabeth's reluctance to sign the warrant was sincere: but of this we shall have more to say hereafter.]

* Alluding, probably, to her letter to Sir Francis Englefield, an English exile and pensioner of Spain, wherein, at the very time that she was negotiating with Elizabeth, Mary was imprudent enough to write, "Of the treaty between the Queen of England and me, I may neither hope nor look for good issue; whatsoever shall become of me, by whatsoever change of my state and condition, let the execution of the Great Plot go forward, without any respect of peril or danger to me." We shall see that this great plot did go forward after her death, and may therefore judge how deeply implicated Elizabeth really was, as the victim in view, though her death altered the whole case with regard to Philip, who flattered himself too much with the hopes of wearing the English Crown in his own right.

"Her friends hold invasion unprofitable while you live, and therefore, in their opinion, your death is first and principally to be sought, as the most compendious way to ruin the realm by invasion." [We have explained this elsewhere.]

"While she shall live, the enemies of the state will hope and gape after your death."

"Since the sparing of her in the fourteenth year of your reign, Popish traitors and Recusants have multiplied exceedingly; and if you spare her now again, they will grow both innumerable and invincible also."

"Mercy in this case would, in the end, prove cruelty against us all; nam est quædam crudelis misericordia: and therefore to save her, is to spoil us."

Then follow many passages of scripture arguments, which, for reasons above given, we omit; but shall add the conclusion, to shew how many important interests were judged to be at stake by the members of the legislature.

"Therefore, we pray you, for the cause of God, his Church, this realm, ourselves and yourself, that you will not longer be careless of your life, our sovereign safety, nor longer suffer religion to be threatened, the realm to stand in danger, nor us to dwell in fear; but as justice hath given rightful sentence, &c. so you will grant execution; that as her life threateneth your death, so her death may, by God's favour, prolong your life."

We are sorry to say, from this time the Queen is judged to have acted with extreme dissimulation, even by Rapin, who otherwise, as we have shewn, appears to us to have accounted for what came to pass in the best manner possible. We are under no necessity of vindicating the Queen's conduct, but we are certainly under no obligation to suppress our own opinion of the case. Rapin and other authors seem to think that the whole process of the trial, and even the proceedings of Parliament, were designed to give a colour to Elizabeth's resentments, and that, in fact, so far from feeling any real reluctance to execute the sentence, she wished for nothing so much. But we are very much inclined to believe, that she felt great reluctance to make it an act of her own. That though quite aware of the crisis to which things were brought, and fully satisfied that Mary's life was more than ever likely to be her death, she had a repugnance to the shedding of her blood on a scaffold; and that after all feeling for the woman was past, she felt for the Queen, and had rather she would have fallen by any hand but her own. This, indeed, is not saying much for her, perhaps quite the contrary, but it has a bearing upon our history which we shall endeavour to explain.

It has always struck us, as an extraordinary circumstance, that in aggravation of the many heavy imputations cast upon Elizabeth for her extreme cruelty towards Mary, her EIGHTEEN years' imprisonment should seem, with some, to be the most condemning proof of all; an instance irrefragable of most inveterate malice and unrelenting persecution; whereas we do in our conscience believe that, except for Elizabeth, she would never have lived so long. When she first came to England, she must have been an object of the greatest embarrassment possible to Elizabeth and her Ministers. We have shewn before what a variety of cases presented themselves to the consideration of the Government, as the probable results either of her release or her detention; but with regard to Elizabeth herself, and the religious struggles on foot, which could not fail to divide her subjects, and weaken the allegiance of many amongst them, it was like having two Queens of England presented to their notice and observation, within the very confines of her own settled dominions. Nor was it long before this was manifested, in the rebellion of 1569, and had Elizabeth been prevailed upon to admit Mary farther into the kingdom, by granting the personal interviews she so often solicited, there is no saying to what extremities even that early movement in her behalf might have proceeded; while it is scarcely to be doubted, that if at that time she had been given up to Murray, or rather to the zealots, not to say fanatics, of that party, Elizabeth would have heard little more of her. We are sorry to say, her fate had been denounced in Scotland from the very pulpits.

We have seen that in no long time after this, and in consequence of the dangers that seemed to threaten all Protestant countries, on the breaking out of the horrible plot at Paris, the Queen's Council, apprehending the presence of Mary in England to be no longer compatible with the safety of the State, or of the Queen, actually wished to have the application for her delivery renewed, which had been previously made to Elizabeth by the Regent's and King's party in Scotland. A case so exceedingly revolting to our own improved feelings, that we should not think of reviving the recollection of it, but to prove these two points, first, that though the danger to England was judged to be so great, of keeping her here, even under restraint, yet there was then no idea entertained of bringing her to trial, much less of putting her to death, to gratify the jealousies or resentments of Elizabeth, though she certainly was intriguing against her at that very time. When indeed her intrigues, through Ridolphi, were discovered, the Parliament took the case up, and earnestly besought Elizabeth to take prompt measures to rid herself of her great rival; yet these addresses had not the effect of bringing things to the crisis contemplated, though it very clearly appears from many letters extant, that Elizabeth was judged by some of her wisest Statesmen to have overlooked her own great danger, and neglected the advice of those who were seriously anxious for her preservation. And even in this last case, after the forms of a trial had been gone through, and a sentence pronounced, and even a parliamentary address delivered to her to put that sentence in execution, we still find her hesitating, though indeed what she had been told by the Speaker of the House of Commons could scarcely fail to be true, namely, that her danger was greatly increased by that sentence as long as it was suffered to remain unexecuted. These things induce us to think, that Elizabeth had a repugnance to the taking away the life of Mary, if it could have been avoided, and that there was not altogether so much dissimulation in the answers she made to the Parliament (preserved by Camden), as some have been led to think. Some parts of these answers are very fine, and seem certainly to us not to be merely declamatory. "I am not more deeply bound to give God thanks for any one thing than for this; namely, that as I came to the crown with the hearty good-will of all my subjects, so now, after twenty-eight years' reign, I perceive in them the same, if not greater affection towards me—and now, though my life has been dangerously shot at, yet I protest there is nothing hath grieved me more, than that one who differs not from me in sex, one of like quality and degree, of the same race and stock, and so nearly related to me in blood, should fall into so great a misdemeanor."—"For your sakes it is, and for my people, that I desire to live; as for me, I see no such great reason (according as I have led my life) why I should either be fond to live or fear to die. I have had good experience of this world; I have known what it is to be a subject, and I now know what it is to be a sovereign. Good neighbours I have had, and I have met with bad; and in trust I have found treason. I have bestowed benefits upon ill-deservers; and where I have done well, I have been ill requited and spoken of. While I call to mind these things past, behold things present, and look forward towards things to come, I count them happiest that go hence soonest."—"We princes are set as it were upon an height in the sight and view of all the world; the least spot is soon spied in our garments; the smallest blemish presently observed in us at a great distance. It is not long since these eyes of mine saw and read an oath wherein some bound themselves to kill me within a month." [On the 8th of October, after the Commissioners were gone to Fotheringay, Davison wrote to Lord Burghley, to beg him to advise her Majesty to be more circumspect of her person, for he had just seen a Dutchman newly come from Paris, who told him that the jeweller of the Queen Mother there, whom he knew, advised her Majesty to beware of one that would present a petition to her on her way to chapel or in her walks.]

In her second answer we find also the following passages: "Very unpleasing is that way, where the setting out, progress, and journey's-end yield nothing but trouble and vexation."—"I have not been so careful how to prolong mine own life, as how to preserve both hers and mine; which that it is now impossible to do, I am heartily troubled. I am not so void of sense and judgment as not to see mine own danger before mine eyes; nor so indiscreet as to sharpen a sword to cut mine own throat; nor so egregiously careless, as not to provide for the safety of mine own life."—"If I should say I will not do what you request, I might say perhaps more than I intend: and if I should say I will do it, I might plunge myself into as bad inconveniences as you endeavour to preserve me from; which I am confident your wisdoms and discretions would not that I should, if ye consider the circumstances of place, time, and the manners and conditions of men."

We cannot see why Elizabeth is never to be believed in a case of such undoubted perplexity, trouble, and personal danger.

That she was at length persuaded that one of the two must fall, is not to be doubted; nor that she would have been glad to have had the execution of the public sentence anticipated by private hands; for it is notorious, that she has incurred the blame of tempting Mary's keepers to end the business by assassination, a most horrible sounding charge to modern ears. But even in this instance, we may well wonder, that in that depraved and dreadfully cruel age, and when Elizabeth is but too credibly supposed to have had an assassin at her right hand, in the person of Leicester, she should have allowed so many as eighteen years to pass, without resort to a remedy so capable of concealment, and, in those strange and contentious times, so common. That Elizabeth must have known that she had neglected opportunities, almost put in her way, of hastening the catastrophe which at last overtook her royal competitor, seems plain from one of the last messages she ever sent to Mary. In a letter to Sir Amyas Poulet, after her removal to Fotheringay, we find this passage: "And bid her from me ask God forgiveness for her treacherous dealing towards the saver of her life many years, to the intolerable peril of her own."

We have some occasion to touch upon these things before we proceed to the sad conclusion of this dismal tragedy, as among the earliest transactions of the ensuing year.*

* It appears to have been at this time that the celebrated antiquary and historian, Camden, published the first edition of his Britannia, which he dedicated to Lord Burghley, with great acknowledgments not only of his kindnesses, but of the assistance he had afforded him, and for the use of his library. Other dates have been assigned to the first edition of the Britannia, but his dedication is dated May 2, 1586.—See Biographia Britannica, art. Camden, Note D. We cannot help expressing our surprise that, at the beginning of the article, Camden should be spoken of as one of the most impartial historians this country ever produced. If he were so in intention, he certainly suffered himself to be misled, or overruled, as to some points, as seems indeed now to be pretty generally admitted.

THE sentence upon Mary was agreed to in the Star Chamber, in a meeting of all the Commissioners except the Earls of Shrewsbury and Warwick (absent through sickness), and Sir Amyas Poulet, on the 25th of October, 1586, "after Nawe and Curle," as Camden relates, "had upon oath, vivâ voce, voluntarily, without hope or reward, avowed, affirmed, and justified, all and every the letters and copies of letters before produced to be true and real." It was confirmed also by the seals and subscriptions of the several Commissioners;* but in con-

* Camden is wrong in saying all the Commissioners except the Earls of Shrewsbury and Warwick, and Poulet, were present; Leicester was absent, and Secretary Davison.—See Nicolas's Life of Davison, 50. Both these latter, indeed, were absent from the Trial; and perhaps Camden meant no more than that all the Commissioners who attended the trial were present at the drawing up of the sentence; about thirty-six out of forty-two appear to have attended the trial. Lord Shrewsbury, who was bonâ fide prevented attending, on the passing the sentence, by illness, wrote to Lord Burghley to express his concern at being absent, begging him to subscribe his name; and sequence of the interposition of l'Aubespine, the French Ambassador (of whom we shall have more to say soon), the sentence was not published before the 21st of December. In the proclamation to this purpose, the Queen seriously protested that this publication was extorted from her, to the exceeding grief of her mind, by a kind of necessity, and at the earnest prayers and intreaties of the estates of the realm: "though," adds Camden, "there were some that thought this to proceed from the art and guise of women, who, though they desire a thing never so much, yet will always seem rather to be constrained and forced to it."

That Elizabeth, to use as plain terms as possible, did by this time heartily wish Mary removed, we would not be supposed to doubt; we believe she was thoroughly sensible of the crisis to which things were arrived, and should therefore have spared her servants and herself the disgrace of a transaction unaccountably strange, but which must be brought forward, in all its circumstances, as greatly implicating the subject of this memoir. If the catastrophe could have been avoided, with perfect safety to herself, we still think there was a reluctance on her part to have Mary executed. Had she died any other death, it would have been a relief to her to have been spared the signing with her own hand the fatal death-warrant. This led her undoubtedly to postpone it, till some of her most faithful servants became uneasy for her safety, at a moment when in truth every hour may be said to have increased her danger, and threatened a fresh convulsion,* to save her competitor, standing on the very verge of the grave; even sending his seal up, to have it used on the occasion. This is quite remarkable, considering how much he must have seen and known of Mary, and is a great proof that we really know nothing of the constitution of men's minds in those remarkable times.—See Lodge's Illustrations, &c. vol. ii. No. ccvii. p. 333. See also the same Lord's Letter to his son, Lord Talbot, No. ccviii.

* The following occurs among the answers given to the Memorial of the French Ambassadors suing for Mary's life to be spared—"Whether the Queen's safety would be exposed to greater dangers, she being executed (as the Ambassadors had pleaded), depended upon future accidents and contingencies. The estates of England, upon serious deliberation of the matter, thought otherwise. There would never be occasions wanting for bad attempts, especially when the affair was come to that pass, that the one had no hope of safety unless the other were ruined; and this must often come into their minds aut ego illam, aut illa me, i. e. either I must take away her life, or she will take away mine." It has often been supposed, that had Elizabeth been at all disposed to release Mary, she had had sufficient securities repeatedly offered in the way of oaths, promises, hostages, &c. &c.:—but it was not ill-observed by her Parliament, that Elizabeth's death alone would cancel all such obligations; and against that, in the then circumstances of and in truth, that no such disturbance took place, is a sort of proof that the subjects of Elizabeth were generally disposed to take her part, though, as she had herself observed in one of her answers to the Parliament, "Many a man would hazard his own life to save the life of a Princess,"—an expression diversely understood and interpreted, but which must have implied, that Mary was in a situation to find defenders, as well as herself. Such a turn has been given to this speech by writers whom we could name, that we must run the chance of being accounted dupes, to fancy that there could be a grain of sincerity in it. But if it be thought that Elizabeth really meant to express, that at this time she wished to save her rival's life, we think she is misrepresented; she appears certainly to have wished not to be in that very situation that should render her order for the execution quite indispensable. Great and very public rejoicings indeed had taken place amongst the lower orders of people, as well as the middle classes, not only on the first detection of Babington's conspiracy, as giving security to the Queen's person, which they felt to be in danger, but at the very time of the proclamation of the sentence against Mary. These were certainly marks of a popular anxiety about her far from equivocal; but her difficulty about signing the warrant, and her very extraordinary conduct after she had signed it, have something in them surpassing our skill to explain. The fact was, to speak politically, either necessary or unnecessary; if unnecessary, she should not have hesitated to withhold the warrant; if necessary, the nation, through its representatives, had taken the burthen on themselves, and might have been looked to as having fairly exonerated the Queen from all blame in signing the warrant; and upon such a sanction she should have done it, without leaving others to incur any blame in executing her orders; but the course she pursued was far otherwise.

Europe, no sufficient security could be devised. To the same tenor is the following answer to the Ambassadors:—"That the French King could neither discover nor hinder secret plots against himself at home—much less was he likely to hinder those against Elizabeth; for treason is plotted in secret, and therefore hard to be prevented. [This might well serve for the French King, (represented by M. Pompon de Bellieme,) and who is judged to have secretly wished for Mary's death; to M. l'Aubespine, the other minister of the Guisian party, the following was more suited.] "That the obligations and oaths of the Guises were of small value, who judged it meritorious to kill the Bishop of Rome's adversaries, and could very easily procure dispensations for their oaths. And what Englishmen, if Elizabeth were slain, and the Queen of Scots, of the House of Guise, advanced to the Crown, durst accuse them of the murder? And if any should accuse them, could they thereby make her live again."

In the meanwhile, we ought perhaps to observe, that between the sentence and the execution, the Kings of France and Scotland sent Ambassadors to solicit Elizabeth to spare Mary's life; but of these embassies, to continue our extract from Burnet, we may now venture to give the following account.

"It is true King James sent one Stuart, the ancestor of the Lord Blantyre, who was then of his bed-chamber, with an earnest and threatening message to Queen Elizabeth for saving his Mother, but in one of the intercepted letters of the French Ambassador, then in Scotland, found amongst Walsingham's papers, it appears, that the King, young as he was then, was either very double, or very inconstant in his resolutions. The French Ambassador assured him, that Stuart had advised the Queen to put a speedy end to that business which way she pleased, and that as for his master's anger, he would soon be pacified, if she would but send him dogs and deer. The King was so offended at this, that he said he would hang him up in his boots as soon as he came back; yet when he came back, it was so far from that, that he lay all that night in the bed-chamber." *

We have told this story as Burnet tells it, not so much for the sake of the anecdote, true or not, but to shew, what was indisputably the case, not only that Elizabeth was far from being the only dissembler, but that whatever formal embassies might be sent to her at this critical moment, either from Scotland or France, she was in the way of receiving secret and private encouragement, directly opposite to the purport of those embassies. Robertson tells the same story of the Master of Gray, that Burnet tells of Stuart; Gray was commissioned by James, together with Sir Robert Melvil, to make proposals to Elizabeth, and if that would not do, to remonstrate warmly with her upon the step she was about to take; "but Gray," says the historian, "with his usual perfidy, deceived his master, who trusted him with a negotiation of so much importance, and betrayed the Queen whom he was employed to save: he encouraged and urged Elizabeth to execute the sentence against her rival; he often repeated the old proverbial sentence, "The dead cannot bite," and whatever should happen, he undertook to pacify the King's rage, or at least to prevent any violent effects of his resentment."* Rapin, who gives James much more credit for the state of his feelings, than is the case with Burnet, says, "The King of Scots, with singular piety, endeavoured to the utmost of his power to save his mother, but all to no purpose, for that the Scots were at variance among themselves, and more favoured Queen Elizabeth than the captive Queen, insomuch as some of them secretly solicited Queen Elizabeth by letters to hasten her execution, and the Scottish Ministers being commanded by the King to commend his mother's safety to God in the Kirks, they refused to do so, such was their hatred to the religion she professed."

* It is scarcely to be expected that James could feel for a Mother whom he can scarcely be said ever to have seen, as others would feel for such a near relation; but it appears from some letters printed by Mr. Ellis, how much his mind did run upon horses, dogs, and deer, only three months after the execution of Mary, and how ready he was in that very year to take Elizabeth's money. See Original Letters, 2d Series, iii. Letter ccxxvi. Two things however we must give him credit for as matters of feeling, viz. the demolishing of Fotheringay Castle, and the erecting to the memory of his unfortunate mother, the sumptuous monument still to be seen in Westminster Abbey.

But let us hear what was the case with regard to France, according to Burnet: †

"As for the pompous embassy that was sent from France to protest against it, Maurier has told a very probable story of Henry III. writing a letter to the Queen, advising her to proceed with all haste to do that which the Embassy was sent to prevent. He saw the House of Guise built a great part of their hopes on the prospect of their Cousin's coming to the throne of England, which would cut off the hopes the House of Bourbon had of assistance from England. I have seen an original letter of the Earl of Leicester's to the Earl of Bedford, who had married his sister, and was then Governor of Berwick, telling him that how high soever the French Ambassadors had talked in their harangues upon that occasion, calling any proceedings against the Queen of Scots an open indignity, as well as an act of hostility against France, since she was Queen Dowager of France, yet all this was only matter of form and decency, that was extorted from the King of France, and how high soever they might talk, they were well assured he would do nothing upon it."

* In Lodge's Illustrations of British History, vol. ii. p. 330. No. ccv., there is a letter to be seen, from the Master of Gray, to Archibald Douglas, in which the former expressly says, "But if matters might stand well between the Queen's Majesty there, and our Sovereign [James], I care not although she [Mary] were out of the way." This Master of Gray was certainly very treacherous, and yet he appears to have been a great favourite with Sir Philip Sidney, that "Prince of Gentlemen," as Sir Fulke Greville, his great friend, calls him, Lodge, ii. 337.

† We are obliged, in justice to Lord Burghley, to refer to the historians of former times, and to tell the story as it was told before the modern advocates of Mary appeared upon the stage; who, in their eager zeal, have sought violently to overthrow every evidence that has been found to stand in their way, and which, therefore, in a work like the present, need to be revived.

There was indeed one French Minister, who took Mary's part very strenuously; we mean L'Aubespine, Ambassador Extraordinary (as Rapin calls him), a man wholly devoted to the Guisian party; he, supposing it to be best to provide for the captive Queen's safety, not by arguments, but by artificial and bad practices, by endeavouring to destroy Queen Elizabeth, was detected in tampering with many persons to that end, and thereby rather hastened than retarded the fatal catastrophe.*

When all these things are duly considered, and made to take their proper place in the winding up of this sad tragedy, really we cannot feel great surprise that Elizabeth (of whose spirit and temper there is no dispute) should think it hard that her hand must be made to strike the blow, which so many others, some on public grounds, but many for merely private and selfish ends, wished stricken as much as herself. In her, it might be as easily construed into personal apprehension, as womanly resentment, and affect her character in both ways; whereas she was notoriously fearless upon such occasions, to such a degree, indeed, as almost to provoke her Ministers, who had always a difficulty to persuade her of her danger. As to her resentments, she by no means concealed them at last; but might well be provoked by the deceitful embassies of Mary's pretended friends, tending only to aggravate the horror of her putting her accomplished relative to death, though wishing her to do it all the while. Leicester is said absolutely to have proposed poison on this great emergency, and to have sent a divine to Walsingham to persuade him it was lawful;† and Elizabeth, as the deed seemed to be quite decided, might, in such days as those were, very possibly feel that some of Leicester's associators, at least, might save her from what she so repeatedly seems to have wished to avoid, namely, that of

* See a full account of this in Camden and Rapin. It was at Cecil House that the Ambassador was charged with these practices, which he would have retorted on his accusers, but failed. He then would have pleaded his privilege, but was told by Burghley that no privilege would cover treason against the Prince's person. He next contended, that, though he might know of such a plot, he was, as an Ambassador, only bound to reveal it to his own Master; but was answered by Burghley, that whatever he might be bound to do as an Ambassador, it was clearly the duty of a Christian to repel and hinder all such injuries.—See also Bishop Carleton's Thankful Remembrancer.

† Mackenzie's Lives of Scotch Writers, cited by Mr. Nicolas, in his Life of Davison. In Scott's History of Scotland, it is affirmed that the Master of Gray confessed before the Council at Edinburgh, 1587, that he, finding Elizabeth resolved to take away the Queen's life, had consented to her opinion of taking her off in some private manner, rather than do it by form of justice; and that he had spoken the words attributed to him, Mortui non mordent.

having the whole "weight thrown on herself." When so many, for various ends and purposes, not in her own court only, but in foreign countries, seemed absolutely to desire the death of her particular rival and competitor, she might reasonably enough wish not to be made the very instrument of their concealed and dissembled purposes, when the very circumstances of the known competition between the two Queens were likely to make the case appear entirely personal on her part, coupled with all the ignominy, besides, of having, as a Queen herself, sent another Queen to the scaffold.

Elizabeth is, in many books, so unsparingly, and so inconsiderately, blamed, on this truly sad occasion, as though she were almost the only enemy and persecutor of Mary—the only unfeeling person—the only dissembler—the only being upon earth directly interested in her death—that we could not refrain from looking a little farther into the story than is commonly the case, not, as we have often before said, with the hope, much less the desire, of weakening any existing impressions in favour of Mary; but of accounting, more particularly and circumstantially, for what really passed on the occasion, and to shew what inextricable perplexities stood in the way of those who are still accused of doing wrong. Wrong, indeed, we must confess they did, but it was to prevent wrong; and though this be at best but a political principle, yet it deserves to be inquired, before we heap blame indiscriminately upon any individual of those days, who was there that went right, or could go quite right, without the hazard of such sacrifices, as, in temporal concerns, it would be almost an infatuation to look for or expect? It is well that we live in better times; but Lord Burghley lived, we think, in the very worst of times, when the most spiteful struggle was on foot that ever disturbed the world; when Papists were conscientiously savage in upholding their religion, and the reformed, in their opposition to Popery, had not yet had time to become essentially reformed; when a settled system of dissimulation in most of the courts of Europe had absolutely destroyed all confidence, and when there was found to be more security in craft, than in swords and shields.*

* The perfidiousness of this age is quite extraordinary; originating, probably, with those self-acknowledged dissemblers, Louis XI. of France and Ferdinand of Spain. An ingenious writer, willing to apologise for this foible in Catherine de Medicis and our Queen Elizabeth, remarks, "It ought at least to be observed, that in mistaking the excess of falsehood for the perfection of address, and the triumphs of cunning for the master-pieces of public wisdom, they did but partake the error of the ablest male politicians of that age of statesmen."—Aikin's Court of Queen Elizabeth, i. 452.

We have shewn that there were some weighty reasons for Elizabeth wishing to avoid, if possible, the making the death of Mary so immediately her own act and deed as the signing her death-warrant could not fail to be. History seems decidedly to shew, that she had, in her great repugnance to this last measure, and probably through the immediate suggestions of Leicester, suffered her feelings to be so worked upon, as to look to the dreadful alternative of private assassination, as a more desirable termination of the whole business.*

At all events, there was, at the least, a more dignified course to pursue, in allowing the sentence, at the unanimous request of the two Houses of Parliament, to be carried into execution. Elizabeth certainly should have seen this, and acted accordingly; and having done so, rested satisfied; but she signed the warrant, without having fully reconciled her mind to a measure she so much wished to avoid, and those who were only guilty of taking her at her word† were made to suffer for it, Lord Burghley being one; but her conduct to Mr. Davison must appear to have been highly unbecoming, and should be placed, perhaps, to the account of that capriciousness of disposition which often led her into great errors, and which in an arbitrary Sovereign is constantly to be dreaded. No man suffered more, perhaps, in this way than Davison; he had

* Whoever will be at the pains to look into Daniel's History of France, may see with what extraordinary confidence and cool deliberation Henry III., two years after the death of Mary, projected the assassination of the Duke of Guise, and his brother, the Cardinal; how he called upon those around him to prove their loyalty by engaging themselves to perpetrate the act, or procure it to be done, and how soon he succeeded in finding an assassin to answer his purposes. We do not bring this forward in excuse of Elizabeth, but to mark the extraordinary character of the times. It is something to say in praise of our countrymen, that no assassin could be found; and yet Sir Amias Poulet, who disdained the proposal made to him to become such, sat upon the trial of Mary, and judged her to be worthy of death. It was not, therefore, the sacrifice of her life upon which he hesitated, but the mode of dispatching her; and, indeed, it is extraordinary that her execution passed off so quietly. Henry III. lost his throne and his life in consequence of the murder of the Guises, but Mary's death, which her advocates to this day call a murder (and we forgive them for thinking it such), made Elizabeth more secure than ever; surely this must have been from a feeling, a public and pretty general feeling, that it was entirely in self-defence; Henry's was so also perhaps, but he preferred assassination, because he did not dare to subject the Duke of Guise to any form of trial. Henry was execrated for what he had done, and denounced from the pulpits; Elizabeth was thanked for her care of the nation, and applauded in the Scots pulpits at least, but, indeed, in some English pulpits also.

† From a letter to be seen in Mr. Ellis's publication, second series, vol. iii. p. 126. it would seem that some had understood that Elizabeth had charged Davison, not to put the warrant in execution before the realm should be actually invaded by some foreign power.

the misfortune, as Secretary of State,* to receive from Elizabeth's hands the fatal warrant, which, after long delays, she had at last been induced to sign; by Davison's own account, he was bidden to carry it immediately to the Lord Chancellor to be sealed, and sent down to the Commissioners, and to say no more to her about it; but she made complaints of Sir Amias Poulet and Sir Drue Drury, who might, she said, if they had chosen it, have rendered her signing the warrant unnecessary, at the same time expressing a wish that he and Walsingham would write to them to that effect, and which in fact was done, though Davison would have dissuaded her, upon an assurance that they were both too honourable persons to lend themselves to so unlawful an act, which, indeed, to their credit, turned out to be the case. Davison, suspecting that he might be called to account for what he should do, however well he might understand the Queen's orders, determined not to act singly, as he told Lord Burghley, who, approving his caution, proposed to summon the Privy Council, and which accordingly met, in a very short time after, at the Treasurer's Chamber; and upon a communication made to them of the warrants being signed, of

* Camden's idea that he was made Secretary of State solely to be made the instrument of the death of the Queen of Scots, is ably refuted by Mr. Nicholas, in his Life of the Secretary, p. 34. We cannot, however, quite agree in his endeavours to clear Davison of all offence against the Queen; Elizabeth signed the warrant and told him to carry it to the Chancellor to be sealed, but to have it done secretly, that it might not be known prematurely, and she sent Killegrew soon after to suggest some delay as to the sealing, but the thing was done; she had suggested his calling on Walsingham in his way to the Chancellor's, but beyond this, she did not particularly authorise him to make the matter known. It appears, however, from his own account, that before he saw either Walsingham or the Chancellor, he actually shewed the warrant signed to both Leicester and Burghley; surely this was rash, and exceeding any directions given by the Queen.—Compare pp. 237, 261. Life of William Davison. The last passage is too curious to be omitted: "And as I was ready to depart from her, she gave me some caution to use it (the warrant) secretly at the seal, in respect of the jealousy she seemed brought to of some about the Chancellor, and doubts lest the divulging thereof might be the occasion to increase her own danger; from her Majesty I went directly down to the Lord Treasurer's chamber, where I found my Lord of Leicester and him together, to whom I shewed her Majesty's warrant. He then went home to dinner, and after dinner to the Chancellor's, calling on Walsingham in his way, which he calls acting according to the Queen's directions; the next morning, at ten o'clock, Killegrew came to tell him from the Queen, that if he had not been with the Chancellor, he should forbear it for a time; certainly, his going voluntarily from her Majesty straight to the Treasurer's chamber, was a great imprudence, and no trifling disobedience of orders; this certainly gave the Queen a handle against him, though he sought to excuse it."—See p. 281. See also the Lord Chief Justice's remark on the Queen's expression, "what haste," p. 311.

Elizabeth's wish to remove from herself as far as possible the imputation of Mary's death, "Each of the Members of the Council," as we read, "immediately offered to bear his part in whatever censure might arise from an act so important to the public safety both in Church and State;* and it was finally agreed, that the warrant should be dispatched without again applying to the Queen, because it was thought that she had already done every thing that was necessary, or could be expected of her, by signing the warrant, and by commanding Davison not to let her hear any more of the affair till it was concluded." The warrant was, therefore, delivered to Beale, the Clerk of the Council, with letters from the Lord Treasurer to the Earls of Shrewsbury, Kent, and Cumberland, and others to whom the warrant was addressed; and on Wednesday, the eighth of February, the scene was closed, and all MARY's earthly tribulations and sufferings terminated for ever!†

It is needless to say, in how dignified and composed a manner the royal sufferer underwent the last sad solemnities of this dismal ceremony; the story is in every body's mouth, and, we should apprehend, almost universally known,‡

* The commission for the execution is to be seen in Howard's Collection of Letters, as penned by Lord Burghley. We have already observed how much he complained in his letters to his friends, of the load of unpleasant business that was cast upon him: whatever was penned by others it was usual to bring to him to correct.

† The Parliament that had been adjourned came together again on the 15th of February, eight days only after the execution, when "Mr. Cromwell," as we read, "moved the House, for that at their petition her Majesty had done justice upon the Scottish Queen, to the greater safeguard of her Majesty's person and the whole realm, he thought it fit that her Majesty might receive from them their humble thanks, which motion was well liked, but at this time it proceeded no further."—D'Ewes, 407.

‡ Among the letters in the possession of Lord Bagot is one written from Fotheringay Castle but a few days after the execution, with this passage in it: "I doubt not but you have heard how resolutely, and in show quietly, she went to her death, who in her lifetime had been the author of so many troubles; wherein her magnanimity and other good gifts meet for so great a calling, no doubt did make us all that were beholding, to pity her want of grace to use them. In other points she shewed herself very obstinate, and far from that which true religion doth require at our hands at such a time." In the next letter, dated Fotheringay Castle, Feb. 28, 1586-7, and addressed to Mr. Bagot, mention is made of some tokens of gratitude and regard sent to his family by some of Mary's household, particularly Mrs. Curle, Melville, and Bastian. The directions for the burial of Mary did not arrive at Fotheringay till the 9th of July, 1587, when the same writer informed Mr. Bagot of it in the following terms:—"Sir, Since the writing of my former letter, dated also this present day, I have received a full direction from the Council to provide for the burial of the Scottish Queen, wherewith I am willing to acquaint you, as with especially since the publication of the second series of Original Letters by Mr. Ellis, who has there given us a copy of the actual report sent to the Court, and indorsed by Lord Burghley; a narrative, we should think, more likely to have been suppressed than preserved by that noble Lord, had he been capable of feeling as some would represent him to have felt; for in no manner could the unhappy sufferer have been rendered so interesting to posterity, as by this correct account of the very last scene of the tragedy;* a spiteful enemy, or an all and the best news this place can yield; the day is appointed to be the first of August; the place, Peterborough, in the Cathedral Church there; the manner with great state and solemnity; the company that are to attend it very great, and many of them honourable; as two Earls, three Countesses, five Barons, five Barons' wives, ten Knights, ten Knights' wives, twelve Esquires, two Bishops, one Dean, thirty Gentlewomen to attend the said Ladies, sixty Gentlemen to attend the said Noblemen, and two hundred Yeomen, besides all the Scottish train here her servants; so that I am directed to provide for the diet of three hundred persons or thereabouts, to have there, at Peterborough, two meals at her Majestie's charge: thus have you briefly that which came to me not above an hour since. And so being now withdrawn from this to more serious causes, I commend you once again and good Mrs. Bagot to the keeping of the merciful God, who hath miraculously preserved her Majesty, our Sovereign, by bringing these things to this good pass. Yours to do you any service, MAR. DARELL.‡

Mr. Melville commendeth himself most heartily to yourself and Mrs. Bagot, and resteth still thankful for your courtesies."

N. B. This Mr. Melville was that faithful and attached servant of Mary, who appears in so interesting a light in the account of her execution; Mrs. Curle also was one of the two attendants selected to attend her on the scaffold, and the wife, we conclude, of Curle the Secretary. And yet here we find them returning their thanks, and sending tokens of remembrance to the family of a Magistrate, in a great measure charged with the safe custody of their unhappy mistress; and this through one of Sir Amias Poulet's household; though Sir Amias himself has been sometimes represented as a most stern and cruel jailer. Surely these are very strong proofs that Mary's imprisonment was never so harsh and unfeeling a restraint, as many still pretend, and of which a great many other proofs might assuredly be adduced.

I feel much indebted to Lord Bagot and Mr. Hamper for the information derived from these letters.

* The following is the view taken of Mary's trial and execution, by an author not otherwise very friendly to the proceedings against her. "As to the letters produced against her, she insisted that they were counterfeit, and the evidence of her secretaries extorted by fear of death. However, I perceive she did not make any difficulty to acknowledge that she had applied herself to the King of Spain and the Guises, to procure her deliverance by force of arms, if other means did not take effect; and she said she thought it but natural for every one to endeavour and desire unjust judge, or any person conscious of having wantonly and unnecessarily sacrificed such a life, would surely have destroyed it. We may conclude, therefore, that to him, as well as to numberless others, it appeared at the time, a case of necessity ;* that is, of self-defence, as to the Sovereign they had to protect.

It must be acknowledged that, at the last, Lord Burghley and Davison took the right way to save Elizabeth from the imputation of conniving at, or even procuring, a deliberate act of assassination. No man, apparently, was more convinced of the necessity for Mary's death than Davison himself, as he told the Queen, when she asked him if he were not sorry to see the warrant their own liberty, but as to any design directly against the life of Queen Elizabeth, this she utterly denied. And 'tis very possible she might not be concerned in that part of the conspiracy, but she was most certainly engaged in such measures, as, if they had succeeded, must have ended in the destruction of Queen Elizabeth; and why, when the Q. of Scots had armed foreign princes against the Q. of England, and invited her own subjects to depose her, she might not as well be deemed an enemy, as if she had invaded the kingdom, I am at a loss to discover. This may pass for an answer to all those who rest the case entirely on the evidence of Mary's having directly conspired to take away the life of Elizabeth. To take off an enemy in her own just defence, reflects no dishonour upon the Queen or her ministry. However Queen Elizabeth shewed all the reluctance imaginable to put the sentence in execution, and would gladly have found out a means to prevent it; but while she was deliberating how to dispose of her, the French Ambassador hired assassins to murder Q. Elizabeth. This, with the reflection on the murder of the Prince of Orange, who had but just been dispatched by a Popish cut-throat, and the repeated addresses of her people in Parliament, to consent to the execution, and prevent hers and her subjects' ruin, prevailed on the Queen to sign her death-warrants. Possibly few private men would make a scruple of taking away a man's life, who lay in wait for theirs, especially if there were no other way of preserving their own; how much more when the fate of a whole nation was concerned, and they saw all the Popish Princes arming against them, and daily exciting assassins to destroy that life on whom their security depended? Had their designs succeeded, another bloody persecution would probably have been the effect, and superstition and ignorance once again overspread the face of Europe, for the preservation whereof we are not a little indebted to the wisdom and steadiness of those who were then in the administration.--See Salmon's Review of the History of England, third edit. 1725.

* State Necessity has been called the "Tyrant's Plea," but why should it be always so? Had there been a possibility of saving the many lives that were sacrificed at Paris alone, on St. Bartholomew's day, 1572, by some summary process against Charles IX. or his more unfeeling mother; would such a case of necessity have deserved to be branded as a mere tyrant's plea? The tyranny was all on the other side, and it is scarcely to be doubted that the vengeance contemplated against the Protestants by the Holy League, was as much to be dreaded; thereby producing a State-necessity of disturbing and interrupting the designs on foot, if possible. It seems to be continually forgotten, that in regard to the projects in hand for Mary's deliverance, the removal of Elizabeth was to be a preliminary step.

signed? He replied, "that he was far from feeling pleasure in the misfortunes of any one; and that, instead of wishing the death of the Scottish Queen, he could not be otherwise than sincerely grieved that a person of her rank and station, and so nearly related to her Majesty, should render so fatal a resolution necessary; but that, as his Sovereign's life was in danger so long as Mary lived,* he thought every man must be of opinion, that she could not defer the execution without manifest injustice to herself and the whole realm; and, consequently, he could not feel sorry to see her adopt an honourable and just course for securing both; and that he preferred the death of the guilty rather than of the innocent." On another occasion, when she was hinting at assassination, upon the advice and opinion of others, whose judgment she commended, he told her, "that he thought the honourable and just way was the safest and the best, if she meant that the sentence should be executed at all;" nor did he scruple to represent to her the cruelty and danger of urging Poulet and Drury to do, what might be the ruin and utter disgrace of two gentlemen who had served her with zeal and fidelity. Davison appears certainly to have acted a very honest part, in thus parrying the Queen's propensities towards an assassination, nor is it improbable that the best of her Council hastened the execution, on purpose to prevent her resorting to such expedients.† It was better even to keep up an appearance of proceeding according to law. Elizabeth, however, manifested great dissatisfaction at what had been done; it may be that she was really vexed; but, at all events, she seems to have been determined to cast the blame from herself as much as possible, and Lord Burghley and Davison became the most marked objects of her displeasure. An ingenious author has supposed, that the great object of her hatred being removed, she might naturally be led to feel some remorse and contrition; but it was not well, in trying to save herself, to throw the blame

* As Davison was at last persuaded of the necessity of putting Mary to death, so he appears to have been as much assured of the propriety of the restraint put upon her previously; as, among the papers written by him, and preserved in the collection of Harleian MSS., there is one, entitled "Reasons against the Liberty of the Queen of Scots."

In this very year, 1587, he wrote a very able letter to the Queen, to dissuade her from a peace with Spain.

† The expression is very strong which they used, as an excuse for not referring any further to the Queen, "lest she might fall into any new conceit of interrupting and stayin the course of justice. [Life of Davison, p. 158.] Considering the malice of her enemies, and disposition of the time and state of things then, both abroad and at home, which they in no duty could neglect."

upon others: such, however, was undoubtedly the course she took. Burghley underwent a temporary banishment from her presence; but Davison was made to feel severely the effect of her displeasure, by a very heavy fine and cruel imprisonment. On the 14th of February, six days only after Mary's execution, he was conveyed to the Tower. Lord Burghley interposed in his favour; but it has been doubted whether he was not swayed, by considerations of private interest, to modify his first expressions of praise and commendation, and whether he did not, ultimately, rather seek to take advantage of his disgrace. In one letter that he wrote to the Queen, but never sent, there can be no question but that he spoke highly of Davison, and greatly deprecated his commitment; but, before a fair copy of this letter could be written, he is represented to have greatly abated of his eulogies, and to have suffered his zeal to cool. We cannot, however, think this to be so certain; perhaps he became more moderate in his expressions, from feeling himself to be also under a cloud: but, after all, he concludes his letter in the following terms: "What your Majesty has minded to him in your displeasure, I hear to my grief; but for a servant in that place, I think it hard to find a more qualified person, whom to ruin, in your heavy displeasure, shall be more to your Majesty's loss than his." Surely this was no great abatement of praise. Davison, however, lost his post of Secretary of State, and was subjected to a most remarkable trial, under a Royal Commission, during which, though almost every Commissioner spoke well of him, and attributed what he had done to a mere mistake at the utmost, yet he was fined 10,000 marks, and subjected to an imprisonment during the Queen's pleasure.*

If this proceeded from mere subserviency to the crown, it reflects disgrace on some of the first personages in the kingdom, and it is scarcely credible even to ourselves, who have had but too much occasion to observe the dreadful servility of Elizabeth's Court, that persons of such elevated stations as archbishops, chief judges, and peers of the realm, should agree, in so severe a sentence, upon such slight causes, and without sufficient evidence, as it appears, to invalidate the statements of the accused; but perhaps we know not all. There is an expression in one of Davison's letters to Sir Amias Poulet, to be seen in Robert of Gloucester's Chronicles, which may certainly induce such a suspicion.—"I pray you," says he (alluding to a request he had made that his letters should be burnt), let me intreat you to make heretics of one and the other, as I mean to use yours after her Majesty has seen it." We do not mean by the above remark to cast any imputation on Davison's integrity or honour; but we merely wish to suggest, that in the judgment we would form, of the proceedings at so trying and critical a moment, it is but fair to suppose, that we cannot know all. Rapin strongly suspects, that Camden, in his zeal for Mary, has not fully related the circumstances of her trial. It is impossible, however, to read Mr. Nicolas's Life of Davison, without being impressed with the idea, that he was most hardly used,* and very unjustly condemned to suffer fine and imprisonment: nor was he ever again admitted to the Queen's presence. Lord Burghley has not escaped

* He survived his dismissal from his office twenty-one years, dying in 1608, much reduced in circumstances by his heavy fine, but not destitute of friends. Even James I., the very year before he died, enabled him to make provision for the payment of his debts, and maintenance of his children, by allowing him to transfer, to trustees, the profits of two offices, the reversion of which had been granted to him by Elizabeth, in 1578. It should be observed, that this act of James's took place when Sir Robert Cecil, his reputed adversary, was as high in the King's favour as his father had been in Elizabeth's; and what is more, though Davison was known to be a favourite with Essex and the two Bacons, the great revilers of the Cecils; for so upon occasions they certainly were, as we shall have to notice.

* In his zealous concern for Mr. Davison, Mr. Nicolas is led, throughout his book, to speak in the harshest terms possible of Elizabeth, and we fear but too justly (for she was certainly a woman of a most strange temper); but, if she were really so hatefully bad, as some writers represent her to have been, she must, one would think, have suffered the mortification to which, as we have read, some tribes of American Indians were accustomed to subject the culprits among them. They were made to appear in public, and receive marked commendations for the very virtues of which they were most notoriously destitute. Drunkards were made to appear, to be praised for their great temperance; thieves, for their honesty; cowards, for their bravery; and so forth: and this seems to have been the case with Elizabeth. Thus Mr. Nicolas speaks of her bad heart and implacable anger towards Davison, in the page immediately following a letter from that very gentleman to the Queen, in which he twice speaks of the "goodness of her most frank and liberal, her most gracious and honourable nature." These contradictions have struck us continually, in many works that we have read, and which have induced us to conclude, that if Elizabeth often acted (as she certainly did), like a froward and spoiled child, those who gave too much way to her humours, or outrageously flattered her, should bear part of the blame. It is quite extraordinary, that in James's own letter to Elizabeth, to stay the execution of his mother, and though she had been then eighteen years in captivity, the following passage is to be found; "That in his singular love and friendship, he could not believe but she, having by her virtues, and especially by her clemency, purchased in all places a most renowned name free from all blot of cruelty, &c. &c.—would preserve and not blemish it by any means with the blood of his mother," &c. Elizabeth, surely, was not the only dissembler on the occasion, if she were really so entirely destitute of all clemency, and prone to all cruelty, in the eyes of her contemporaries, as she has been judged to be by many, two centuries since.

the censure of posterity for being instrumental in procuring or continuing this seclusion from the Court, being anxious, as it has been alleged, to secure the Secretaryship for his son, Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury. In the Life of William Davison, Mr. Nicolas says, " It is positive that there is no circumstance which can be adduced in contradiction of these charges." We must confess we think otherwise, though our proofs belong to a subsequent year; but in general we may say, that in the course of Essex's endeavours to serve him, and whose letters to Davison are printed by Mr. Nicolas, it does not appear that Elizabeth had been set against him by others; and even Mr. Nicolas himself, p. 196. seems clearly to attribute Davison's failure of recovering her favour, to Elizabeth's own feelings and prejudices, and which indeed appear, in this instance, to have been disgracefully inveterate; founded upon a mistaken idea of the resentment of the King of Scots, to whom (and which may pass for another proof of the true state of Elizabeth's feelings) Essex thought proper to write in behalf of his friend; and it is Mr. Nicolas's own remark, that this application to James " may be deemed a full proof that Essex considered Davison's loss of favour as a sacrifice to James's resentment." We hope, therefore, that the imputations cast on Lord Burghley, as Davison's enemy, may be regarded as unfounded, while it is but doing him justice to observe, that in his zeal to serve his son, he was fully justified, not only as a father, but as a statesman, Sir Robert Cecil being remarkably well qualified to succeed Walsingham as Secretary of State, on the decease of the latter, in 1590, without any disparagement to Davison; could Essex have procured the liberation of the latter.*

* Davison was, by marriage, related both to Lord Burghley and Lord Leicester, though very distantly. It may be questioned whether Elizabeth's resentment might not be fomented by the latter rather than by Lord Burghley: in procuring and delivering the warrant for execution, pursuant to the sentence, he appears to have acted in conformity with Burghley's plan; but in denouncing the assassination plot, he ran counter to Leicester's advice, as well as Elizabeth's desire of evading the " chief weight" of Mary's death, and " casting the burthen from herself." Besides, we think nobody can read Davison's Memorial sent to Walsingham, purporting to be a summary report of that which passed between her Majesty and him in the cause of the Scottish Queen, from the signing of the warrant to the time of his restraint, and dated Feb. 20, 1586-7, only 12 days after Mary's execution, without perceiving it to be a severe charge upon her Majesty, and a direct exposure of her disposition to have had Mary privately made away with; in fact, it is chiefly from Davison's memorials, that we know the very worst of Elizabeth's conduct, and though they might be written in defence of himself, they are grievously at the expense of Elizabeth, and might well have exasperated a less irritable person, especially as they are reports of a private Lord Burghley, as we have observed, fell into disgrace with Elizabeth, for his share in the business of the warrant as well as Davison, but the Queen knew better than to keep him long out of employment. It was too much the fashion of the courtiers in those days, to acknowledge that they had done amiss, if the sovereign chose to say so, always reserving to themselves the plea of better intentions. Lord Burghley did not scruple in this manner to confess his error, and implore forgiveness, though he must have felt at the time, that he was not really responsible for any misconstruction the Queen might put upon his actions; he knew, that against the Queen there was no appeal, and the acknowledgment of an unintentional fault, it might be thought, could never be unbecoming.

His first letter to the Queen, however, after his disgrace, betrays none of that abjectness so common to other suitors. The following passage undoubtedly does him credit.

"I hear with grief of mind and body also, that your Majesty doth utter more heavy, hard, bitter, and minatory speeches against me, than almost against any other; and so much the more do they wound me, in the very strings of my heart, as they are commonly and vulgarly reported; although by some, with compassion of me, knowing my long, painful, faithful, and dangerous unspotted service, but by divers others, I think, with applause, as maliceing me for my true service against your sworn enemies. And if any reproach, yea, and if any punishment of me may pleasure your Majesty, and not hinder your reputation (which is hardly to be imagined), I do yield thereto; and with a most willing mind do offer unto your Majesty, as a sacrifice, either to pacify your displeasure, or for your Majesty to pleasure any other (friend or unfriend), to acquit myself freely from all places of public Government, whereof none can be used by me to your benefit, being in your displeasure; and I shall nevertheless continue in a private estate, as earnest in continual prayer for your Majesty's safety, and my country, as I was wont to be in public actions.

conversation with a Minister and Privy Counsellor. We do not dispute the truth of them, nor the provocation Davison had received, but he could not, one would think, expect much favour after such an exposure of the Queen's private sentiments, unfeeling, and undignified behaviour. We question, whether the mode in which he sought to save her honour, by referring to her Majesty's remembrance certain points which he did not choose to divulge openly, did not convey insinuations exceedingly hurtful to her credit—though Camden seems to have been mistaken, in fancying that he was purposely brought forward to bear the blame of Mary's death; yet we think he did him both credit and justice, in saying, that, "he was a man of good ingenuity, but not well skilled in court arts."

"And whatsoever worldly adversity your Majesty shall lay upon me, I constantly and resolutely shall, by assistance of God's grace, affirm, prove, and protest to the world, during the few days of my life, that I never did, or thought to do any thing with mind to offend your Majesty, or to commit any unhonest act; but in the presence of God, who shall judge both quick and dead, I do avow, that I was never in my under-age more fearful to displeasure my masters and tutors, than I have been always inwardly, both out of and in your presence, to miscontent your sacred Majesty, which proceeded, I thank God, of due reverence, and not of doubtfulness how to do my duty.

"Thus, most gracious Queen, being by my mishap deprived of your presence, I have confusedly uttered my deep griefs, &c., being glad that the night of my age is so near by service and sickness, as I shall not long wake to see the miseries that I fear others shall see that are like to overwatch me; and having ended that concerneth myself, I cannot in duty forbear to put your Majesty in mind, that if Mr. Davison be committed to the Tower, who best knoweth his own cause, the example will be sorrowful to all your faithful servants, and joyful to your enemies."—This letter was written on the 13th of February, five days only after Mary's death.

Other letters he addressed to the Queen, in which he repeated, that her Majesty, he understood, was more deeply offended with him than with the rest, though he was no more to be charged than others, which he supposed increased, because her Majesty had not heard him, as she had others,* whom she had admitted to her presence; while he, by his lameness and infirmity, &c. could not come.

He still, however, sought to be admitted to her presence to clear himself, but she caused it to be signified to him that he might do it by writing, which he declined, "knowing," as he said, "what ill willers he had about the court (alluding probably to Leicester and his party), who would be apt to put sinister interpretations upon what he should write; and that a writing was but a composition of words, that might otherwise be taken for want of his being present to explain and reply." He, therefore, craved to have leave "to deliver the sense of his heart by his own tongue." At length, however, he attained his end, the Queen needing his advice concerning her affairs in the Low Countries; but, on his first admission at Court, being rather rudely handled by Elizabeth, on the business of the Queen of Scots, he absented himself again from the Court, and was not brought back again without some intercession; writing, in the mean time, to the Vice Chamberlain, in terms of serious complaint, at the angry words that had passed, and attributing them rather "to some secret enemies," than to "any influence of her Majesty's princely nature," concluding his letter with the following passage in Greek:

Μακαριος ὁστις μακαριοις ὑπηρετεῖ·

" 1586. After the Scots Queen death.

Wednesday, Febr."

It may easily be supposed, that, out of common decency, the King of Scotland would make some movements to revenge his mother's death; but it must have been very obvious, at the same time, that, without assistance, and in the unsettled state of his own kingdom, he could not seriously intend to attack England. Fortunately for the latter, it was difficult for the King of Scotland to call in any foreign friends to his assistance, without a risk of their making a prey of Scotland as well as England. The English ministers, therefore, and especially Lord Burghley, who had constantly his eye upon every part of Europe, had a good opportunity of keeping James quiet, by a fair and true representation of the danger he might incur by entering into any confederacies to avenge the death of Mary. Care had been taken to assure him, that in any proceedings against his mother, his own claims upon England should remain on the same footing as before, and therefore all that remained to be done was to point out to him, not only the good policy, but the almost absolute necessity of his continuing quiet; and this seems to have fallen, as might be expected, to the care of Lord Burghley, who is supposed, by some, to have written the able letter, to be seen in Strype,* purporting to be addressed to some Scotch nobleman near the King's person, in order to dissuade the latter from war; and which had not only the effect intended, but led in the end to a continuance of the friendship and alliance previously subsisting between James and Elizabeth.

But it was not the King of Scotland only, who was to be kept quiet, after Mary's execution. We have already shewn, that her removal was likely to act as a fresh stimulus to the ambition of Philip;† and it was quite as plausible a

* Strype seems clearly to attribute this letter to Lord Burghley, and some parts of it are certainly much in his style. Others, however, attribute it to Walsingham.

† Dr. Lingard seems to have, in a great measure, cleared up the difficulties respecting Mary's will, in which she was said to have left England to the King of Spain, in case her son should not become a Roman Catholic. One of the partizans of Mary tells us, as an undoubted matter of fact, that " this story was first broached in England," and " Cecil, Hatton, and Walsingham," are named as the bungling authors of a pretended letter to Mendoza, the Spanish minister, then in France, from Mary, announcing her intention of leaving England to his master. A copy of this pretended letter, it seems, being extant, having the signatures of those three statesmen, but in plea for him to set up, that he was coming to revenge her death, as it was before, that he was coming to prevent it.* His armada was known to be in great forwardness; his confidence of success every hour increasing; England, at so critical a moment, not sufficiently prepared to resist him; and a possibility, if not, indeed, a great probability, that after what had just passed, many of Elizabeth's Catholic subjects might not be firm in their allegiance. In this conjuncture, a very extraordinary step seems to have been taken, to throw impediments in the way of Philip's designs, and to oblige him to postpone his attack for one year at the least. We have the story principally from Burnet, and in his words, therefore, we shall give it to the reader, as a continuation of our former extracts.

different coloured ink, which shews, says the author, that they were not all together when they signed it; but as Cecil's signature, however, agrees in colour with the letter itself, the forgery is supposed to be brought home to him. In conformity with this letter, which is dated May 26, 1586, Mary has been stated to have made a will before her execution, and to have written it herself, as attested by the Cardinal Laurea, and Owen, Bishop of Cassano, a fact much corroborated by the Abbé Pignerol, in his Life of the Cardinal Laurea, to the abuse of those over-credulous writers, De Thou and Dr. Gilbert Burnet.—See Campbell's Case of Mary Queen of Scots. Dr. Campbell proposes, in the places referred to, that the real will should be produced, as a document "more probative than Cecil's letter, or the Abbé Pignerol's tale;" but whether the will be produceable or not, we do not find it in Dr. Campbell's book. We have, however, Dr. Lingard's authority for saying, that Mary did really write a letter, as soon as she was ordered to prepare for death, viz. November 23, 1586, to Sixtus V., recommending to him and Philip the conversion of her son, in which, if they should not succeed, through James's obstinacy, she then leaves all her right to the crown of England to the disposal of the Pope and of that Monarch. The original is in the Vatican, with an attestation by Owen, Bishop of Cassano, that the handwriting is that of Mary herself. We cannot blame any of the partizans of Mary for their feelings towards her; but it is manifestly our business to question their feelings towards others. We really think Queen Mary's undoubted letter to Sixtus, is sufficient to save the credit, as far as her intentions are concerned, of Cecil, Hatton, Walsingham, the Abbé Pignerol, De Thou, and Dr. Gilbert Burnet.—See Lingard, vol. v. note AA. After all that has been said, Scott, in his History of Scotland, we remember, pronounces it to be utterly improbable that ever she intended such a thing, for, before the Commissioners, and at all times, and especially at her death, she solemnly declared the contrary. So difficult is it to arrive at the truth, in discussing this sad case; especially when so much is made to depend on the veracity of individuals, Mary not excepted.

* "With this view" (of helping the Queen of Scots), "Philip," says Voltaire, "equips that prodigious fleet, which was to be supported by another armament in Flanders, and by a rising of the Catholics in England. This was what ruined the Queen of Scots, and instead of procuring her liberty, brought her to the scaffold. Nothing remained but for Philip to avenge that Princess's death, by conquering the crown of England for himself, and then Holland would soon be subdued and punished."—General History, iii. chap. xii.

"But the Court of England saw, that if King Philip's fleet was in a condition to conquer England, he would not abandon the design, for Mary's being put out of the way; and that he certainly designed to conquer it for himself, and not for another. So orders were given to make all possible haste with a fleet: yet, they were so little provided for such an invasion, that though they had then twenty good ships upon the stocks, it was not possible to get them in a condition to serve that summer; and the design of Spain was to sail over in 1587. So, unless by corruption, or any other method, the attempt could be put off for that year, there was no strength ready to resist so powerful a fleet; but when it seemed not possible to divert the present execution of so great a design, a merchant of London, to their surprise, undertook it. He was well acquainted with the revenue of Spain, with all their charges, and all that they could raise: he knew all their funds were so swallowed up, that it was impossible for them to victual and set out their fleet, but by their credit in the bank of Genoa. So he undertook to write to all the places of trade, and to get such drafts made on that bank, that he should, by that means, have it so entirely in his hands, that there should be no money current there equal to the great occasion of victualling the fleet of Spain. He reckoned the keeping such a treasure dead in his hands, till the season of victualling was over, would be a loss of 40,000*l.*; and, at that rate, he could save England. He managed the matter with such secresy and success, that the fleet could not be set out that year. At so small a price, and with so skilful a management, was the nation saved at that time. This, it seems, was thought too great a mystery of state to be communicated to Camden, or to be published by him, when the instructions were put in his hand for writing the History of that glorious reign; but the famous Boyle, Earl of Cork, who had then a great share in the affairs of Ireland, came to know it, and told it to two of his children, from whom I had it."

If this story were true, the London merchant was indeed a great friend to his country, for in April of this year, an expedition took place, under Sir Francis Drake, against the Spaniards, which having succeeded, to the capture or destruction of many ships of different sizes in the road of Cales, Sir Francis wrote home to Lord Burghley, to give him the following information: "Assuredly there was never heard of or known so great preparations as the King of Spain hath, and daily maketh ready for the invasion of England, as well out of the Straits, from whence he hath great aid from sundry mighty Princes, as also from divers other places in his own country, and his provisions of bread and wine are sufficient for 40,000 men a whole year.* The uniting of all which forces will be very dangerous unless their meeting be prevented: which by all possible means we will seek to perform, as far as our lives will extend. No doubt but this which God hath permitted us to do, will cause them to make alteration of their intent; nevertheless, it is very necessary that all possible preparation for defence be speedily made."

In consequence of this information, great attention was paid to the Sea-ports, and orders and directions sent for their better security, chiefly drawn up and prepared by Lord Burghley; attention was given also to the condition of the Magistracy, that in case of an emergency, the Justices might be found actuated by a proper zeal for the Queen's affairs, and true to the Government established. The Bishops being written to by his Lordship, "who had," as Strype remarks, "the great care of all lying upon him under the Queen," to procure information of the condition of the Justices in their several dioceses, and make their reports to Government, some being justly suspected of disaffection or other grievous disqualifications for an office of such high trust; as partiality, want of abilities, and, in some instances, common honesty. And how necessary an attention to these things appeared to be, now that the nation was in such danger, may be judged, from some answers made to the Lord Treasurer by the Bishops. Howland, Bishop of Peterborough, after expressing his hope, that his Lordship's interference in this, as in all other reformations he had brought about, might tend to lay a firm and honourable foundation for better things, writes, "Wherein also I beseech your Lordship to go forward; assuring your Lordship that although you have done many things of very great import to the benefit of the realm, which all men do acknowledge, yet for the sound setting of the whole realm in firm obedience to their Sovereign, and for the preservation of love between every member, you could never take (I speak as a fool, but yet as I think) a more honourable cause in hand, and more acceptable to the people; who think it their greatest good or hurt to be under good or evil Justices."

Herbert,† Bishop of Hereford, wrote, "I certainly persuade myself, that this your Lordship's care and course (if it shall be answerable accordingly) will in a short space work a very sensible and great effect, beneficial both to the state and true religion;—and may best further that good which your Lordship sheweth yourself only to respect."

* This would seem to be some contradiction to the above story—and Camden states it to have been in consequence of the losses of provisions and munition of war, by Drake, that Philip was prevented sending out his fleet this year. Burnet, however, has given his authorities.

† The surname of this Bishop was Westphaling.

Many more letters to the same effect, may be seen in Strype; we have merely cited the above passages to shew, what multifarious cares, and what a variety of objects, continually engaged the attention, and occupied the time of Lord Burghley; all tending either to the better government of the nation internally, or to its surer defence externally against foreign foes: for while he was thus seeking to reform and improve the Magistracy, by purifying the Commissions; and, in a great variety of instances, listening to appeals from both the Universities, and interposing his good offices in many ecclesiastical cases of difficulty, not only in England, but in Ireland;* while he had the care of the Treasury and management of the revenue, and guardianship of the Wards, continually upon his hands, by virtue of the offices he held, there was no question of trade or commerce, of peace or war, or, which is more remarkable, of military defence and discipline, that was not in the first instance submitted to his judgment. Thus it appears, that upon the rumour of the mighty designs

* We have so repeatedly had occasion to notice the references made to Lord Burghley, in all cases affecting the Church or the Universities, that we are desirous rather of shortening our account of such matters, where other things of equal or greater importance press upon our notice, than run the risk of tiring the patience of our readers by dwelling upon particular cases, treated of at large in other books; above all, in Strype's voluminous writings, especially his Annals of the Reformation during this reign, with the lives of those eminent Prelates, Parker, Grindal, Whitgift, and Aylmer, all of which should be consulted by such as would wish to acquire a just knowledge of the several occurrences in which Lord Burghley was called upon, as a judge, an arbitrator, a referee of all parties, and, not unseldom, as a Divine; as was the case at this very time, when one might suppose that the affairs of the State alone had been sufficient to overwhelm the mind of any man in his eminent situation.—We find him involved in that celebrated dispute, already alluded to, between Travers and Hooker, at the Temple; in the course of which, not only Travers referred to him all the objections to Hooker's doctrine, but the latter as carefully submitted to him his replies; while the Archbishop himself, of whose interference Travers greatly complained, condescended, in a letter to Lord Burghley, to answer all his arguments, with great learning, and copious references to the Fathers; Travers professing to refer to him, for his great wisdom and deep judgment in such causes, which seems to have been quite as much the case with Travers's opponents, Hooker and Whitgift: the points in question relating both to doctrine and discipline. From Ireland he was called upon to interpose his good offices, to settle a dispute between the Archbishop and the Lord Deputy, Sir John Perrott, "a troubler of Bishops," as Strype calls him; and, as Chancellor of Cambridge, to correct many abuses in regard to the expenses, and even dress of the young men, their "satin doublets, silk and velvet overstocks, great fine ruffs, and costly facings of their gowns."—See Annals, iii. p. 710, the Lord Treasurer's letter to the Vice Chancellor.

and preparations of the Spaniards this year, those whose talents lay that way, prepared discourses, in which the best methods were suggested of speedily augmenting the forces of the kingdom, providing for their encampment, and laying a foundation for such an able and well disciplined army, as might bid defiance, with the aid of the navy, to the proud pretensions of Philip and his invincible Armada. Such discourses, by Mr. Lane, whom Leicester had acknowledged as his "very friend," in a letter to Secretary Wylson some years before, and whom Strype calls "a brave Gentleman, and skilful in arms, and a man of thought and invention in warlike affairs," made their appearance at this critical time, being presented in the very first instance, not to Leicester, though he bore the distinction of Lieutenant General of the Queen's forces, but to Lord Burghley; "to whose wisdom and experimented judgment," as he wrote, "the counsels of all her Majesty's martial actions seemed very specially to be referred," a circumstance of which many decisive proofs remain to this day, in the British Museum, greatly too numerous to be insisted upon, as is the case, indeed, in all the other instances to which we have alluded; in his correspondence with the Heads of both the Universities,* with particular Colleges, with the Bishops, with all the Queen's Ministers abroad, with her Captains and Commanders in the Netherlands (whom Leicester, then in England, seemed to have abandoned), with persons of all parties at home,† Papists and Puritans,

* Though Chancellor of Cambridge, his attentions to Oxford were unremitted, as that University had occasion to acknowledge, in a special letter of thanks this very year, in which they profess to have received more obligations than they were previously aware of, and to be beholden to him, not only for a general care of their concerns, but for the particular pains and solicitude with which he had prosecuted their affairs: "Non cura solum, sed plane anxietas et solicitudo," is the expression they use. The letter is signed in the name of the whole University, "Academia Oxoniensis," and addressed "Amplissimo honoratissimoque viro dño Cecilio baroni de Burghleigh, summo totius Angliæ thesaurario, regiæ Majestati ab intimis consiliis, dño nostro colendissimo."—Strype's Annals, iii. Appendix, No. xli. book ii.

The letter immediately preceding [No. xl.] happens also to be a letter of thanks to his Lordship, from the Master and Fellows of Christ's College, Cambridge, for his care in terminating an unpleasant controversy between the members thereof and the Vice Chancellor, whereby they acknowledge themselves debtors for, (to use their own words,) "Maximum æternumque beneficium." The beginning of this letter will shew the sense they entertained of his finding time to attend to such disputes:—"Cum Curam tuam qua reip. summam complecti soles, honoratiss. domine, ad privatas Colegii nostri res demittere dignatus fueris, &c."

Recusants and Conformists, with literary persons, and all who seemed to be labouring under any difficulties public or private.

This is the person whom the advocates of Mary, in their zeal for that unfortunate Princess, scarcely ever speak of in their writings, but to represent him to be a monster of wickedness; malignant, treacherous, selfish, and unfeeling; made up of cunning and deceit; blood-thirsty and cruel.

That he was driven to act sometimes as if he were so, it is impossible for us to deny; but when we have such abundant testimony to produce, on the part of his contemporaries, of a totally contrary disposition; when it is still in our power to ascertain many of the causes and circumstances whereby he was compelled to be severe in his counsels, suspicious in his negotiations, cautious, distrustful, secret, and dissembling (to counteract dissimulation in others); when we consider that he lived in an age when many things abhorrent to our very nature were comparatively common—as the decapitation of Queens, Princesses, Chancellors, Protectors, and many of the highest orders of the Nobility; when the imprisonment or burning of Archbishops, Bishops, and the Clergy of all denominations, were no unusual occurrences; when persecution in religion was in many parts regarded as an obligation on the conscience; when torture was every where in practice, as an instrument of punishment, both in civil and ecclesiastical tribunals; when craft and deceit were acknowledged to be among the chiefest qualifications of a statesman, whether on the throne, or in the councils of all sovereigns, the wonder to us is, that there was to be found, in any minister of the sixteenth century, so much true wisdom, so much justice, so much impartiality, so much sober discretion, so much right judgment, so much candour, so much propriety of moral conduct, and so much moderation, as was to be found in Lord Burghley. Yet was it not to be expected, that in so high and conspicuous a station as he constantly occupied, and in so contentious an age, he should escape envy or totally avoid giving offence. It is well known of Halling in the above county, and which he called his halcyon days;—[Annals, iii. 723-4]. See also the case of Cawdry, [Life of Bishop Aylmer, ch. viii.] "Not only myself," says Lambard, in his thankful letter, "will daily call unto God for you, but will also teach my poor sucklings to send up and sound your praises in his ears." By the same Lord, he was afterwards raised to some eminent place in his profession, probably to be a judge, when he again returned his thanks to his patron, in a letter to be seen in the Appendix to Strype's 3d vol. No. xlii. book ii. In Cawdry's case, Lord Burghley seems to have considered chiefly his poverty, "his desolate state and great charge," as he calls it, p. 92, the man "having a wife and eight children," p. 87. Otherwise he appears to have been bold and obstinate.

how utterly impossible it is for a great minister to screen himself against the shafts of malevolence, the vengeance of enemies, the abuses of party, or the revilings of the discontented. It was about this time that an attack of this nature was made upon him in a Popish libel, in which, as is usually the case, much was asserted that was positively untrue; thereby fortunately affording his friends an opportunity of vindicating him from such notorious slanders. A paper of this description may be seen in the Appendix to Strype's third volume of his Annals, p. 503, so often referred to, and from which we shall only venture to insert a few extracts, as his character never stood more in need of vindication and support than at this particular period of his long and arduous services.*

"It is a strange fancy in the libeller, that he maketh his Lordship to be primum mobile in every action, without distinction. That to him her Majesty is accountant of her resolutions; and the Earl of Leicester and the Secretary Walsingham, both men of great power and wisdom, but as instruments."

This seems to be a mistake common amongst certain historians to this day. With the Queen, he certainly ventured to remonstrate occasionally; and no doubt had influence to turn her aside at times from some of her most resolute purposes; but she was never to be blindly led, nor would she ever compromise her own judgment and authority. He, like others, as the paper intimates, "was bound to rest upon such conclusions as her Majesty in her own wisdom determined—and them to execute to the best of his abilities." And as to Leicester and Walsingham, it is probable that they were frequently two of his greatest hinderers, if not positive opponents; giving him occasion rather, as the paper further states, to interpose, "to qualify generally all hard and extreme courses, as far as the service of her Majesty and the safety of the State" would permit; "and to make himself compatible with those with whom he served in like parity;" so far hath his Lordship been from inciting others, or running a full course with them in that kind.

* Strype says, vol. iii. 725, Oxford edition, that this libel on Lord Burghley occasioned a vindication of him by some particular order from himself, wiping off those scandalous reports that were given out of him. "Whether then printed or no," he adds, "I cannot tell." "I transcribe it from the original paper, as I found it in the Cotton Library." It is odd that he does not seem to have known that it was from the pen of Lord Bacon, who, as he had his father to defend as well as Lord Burghley, was not ill employed in such a work. The author of Biographia Britannica supposes it to be the first political production of Bacon's pen, adding, that these sort of ministerial pamphlets were much in fashion in those days, and proved the great support of the Queen's administration; "For her ministers, being wise and able men, and acting upon just and honest principles, were not afraid of explaining and justifying their conduct," &c.

The following passage deserves to be transcribed at length; as it helps to explain the malicious manner in which some of the very best parts of this great man's conduct and character, were wilfully misrepresented and traduced by the Popish party abroad, and tends to confirm what we have just said, of his being far better in many most essential points, than others of the strange age in which he lived. "But yet it is more strange, that this man should be so assuredly malicious, as he should charge his Lordship not only with all actions of State, but also with all the faults and vices of the times; as if curiosity and emulation have bred some controversies in the Church; (though thanks be to God they extend but to outward things;) if wealth and the cunning of wits have brought forth multitudes of suits of law; if excess in pleasure or in magnificence, joined with the unfaithfulness of servants, and the greatness of many men, have decayed the patrimony of many Noblemen and others; that all these and such like conditions of the time, should be put upon his Lordship's account, who hath been, as far as to his place appertaineth, a most religious and wise moderator in Church matters, to have unity kept; who with great justice hath dispatched infinite causes in law, that have been orderly brought before him; and for his own example may say, (what few can say) that what was said by Cephalus the Athenian, so much renowned in Plato's works, who having lived near unto the age of an hundred years, and in continual affairs and business, was wont to say of himself thus, 'He never sued any, neither had been sued by any;' who by occasion of his office * hath preserved many great houses from overthrow, by relieving sundry extremities towards such as in their minorities have been circumvented, and towards all such as his Lordship might advise, did ever persuade sober and limited expense.

"Nay, to make farther proof of his contented manner of life, free from suits and covetousness, as he never sued any man, so did he never raise any rent, or put out any tenant of his own, or ever give consent to have the like done to any of the Queen's tenants: matters singular to be noted in his age. Let his proceedings, which be indeed his own, be indifferently weighed and considered, and let men call to mind, that his Lordship was never any violent and transported man in matters of State, but respective and moderate; no vindicative man; no heavy enemy, but ever placable and mild;—no glorious, wilful, proud man, but ever civil, familiar, and good to deal withal. That in the course of his service he hath rather sustained the burthen, than sought the function of honour and profit; scarcely sparing any time from his cares and travail to the sustentation of his health. That he never had, nor sought to have, for himself or his children any penny-worth of lands or goods that appertained to any person that was attainted of any treason, felony, or otherwise. That he never had, or sought, any kind of benefit by any forfeiture to her Majesty.—That he ever bore himself reverently, and without scandal, in matters of religion, and without blemish in his private course of life.

"Let men, without passionate malice, call to mind these things, and they will think it reason, that though he be not canonized for a Saint at Rome, yet he is worthily celebrated as pater patriæ in England. And though he be libelled against by fugitives, yet he is prayed for by a multitude of good subjects; and, lastly, though he be somewhat envied without just cause while he liveth, yet he shall be deeply wanted when he is gone. And assuredly, many Princes have had many servants of trust and sufficiency; but where there hath been great parts, there hath often wanted temper of affection; where there hath been ability and moderation, there hath wanted diligence and love of travail; where all these have been, there have wanted sometimes faith and sincerity; where some have had all these four, yet they have wanted time and experience; but where there is a concurrence of all these, there is no marvail that a Prince of judgment be constant in the employment and trust of such a person, of whose faithfulness, as she hath had proof so many years in her own time, as it were very hard; but if he had gone about to abuse her, at some time she should have espied it; so, to begin withal, he brought with him such a notable evidence of his constant loyalty, as a greater could not have been.

"For, to confirm her Majesty's opinion in choosing him to be her first Counsellor, he, of all other Counsellors in King Edward's time, refused to consent to the determination of a pretended will of King Edward's, to deprive the Lady Mary, afterwards Queen, and then the Lady Elizabeth, now Queen; for whom, two times, he only of all the then Counsellors did, for conscience sake, adhere, to the peril of his head, if Queen Mary had not enjoyed the crown: for the which, it is well known, that Queen Mary did not only reward him, but offered him to have been of her Council, which he, for good respects, did forbear to accept."

This is certainly a very curious defence of Lord Burghley, as amounting to a direct and positive appeal to his own contemporaries, and in the face of his enemies and slanderers, as to the truth of all the points insisted upon: for, if he had not been such a person as this paper represents, it was only giving a fresh opportunity to his enemies to triumph over him. No weaker defence against false accusations can be thought of, than false praise. Many particulars are insisted on in the above paper, which, if not true, must have tended only to cover Lord Burghley with confusion, instead of amounting to any defence of his character. It helps, also, to clear up a curious piece of history, which occasioned us no small trouble in the writing of our first volume. Can it be supposed, that if the story of his loyalty to Mary and Elizabeth, at that great time of trial, at the close of the life of Edward, had been untrue, he could have allowed it to be brought back to the recollection of Elizabeth, or to the still sorer and more irritable recollection of Leicester, who was yet alive, and whose father was so directly struck at, in the mere mention of Edward's pretended will?* Nor were Leicester and he upon such good terms at this time, as to have led him to expect any mercy from him, for they were not in agreement about the affairs of the Netherlands, a very sore point with Leicester, as may be seen by the very next paper in Strype's Appendix, purporting to be a letter from the Earl of Leicester to the Lord Treasurer, justifying himself for some angry speeches used to that Lord,† who had thwarted him in somewhat discoursed before the Queen in Council, a pretty good proof that he was not one of Lord Burghley's instruments, as the libel set forth.‡

But Lord Burghley suffered in another quarter this year, upon the reputation

* In the letters that passed between these two great men, in 1585, Leicester charged Lord Burghley with being under greater obligations to his father (Northumberland), than to the Duke of Somerset. Lord Burghley, though willing to acknowledge such favours as he had received from Northumberland, does not seem to have at all admitted that he was obliged to such an extent. We have before shewn that his talents were useful both to Somerset and Northumberland.

† We have not Lord Burghley's letter before us, to which this of Lord Leicester's was a reply. Not to deny justice to the latter, we must allow, that if he wrote truth, he had some reason to complain.

‡ Having availed ourselves of this paper to clear up the difficult point of history in our first volume, we are led to remark, that this year terminated the life of the Duchess of Somerset, relict of the Protector, who, notwithstanding all her previous sufferings and mortifications, appears to have died very rich; and though some writers have not hesitated to accuse Lord Burghley of being a betrayer of his first patron, the Duke, her husband, yet, to shew how little the Duchess herself credited such slanders, he is particularly remembered in her will, by a friendly bequest of "a jug of chrystal, with a cover dressed with silver and gilt, and a ring with an emerald." Her Grace was ninety years old when she died.

of having more power at Court than was really the case; his unworthy son-in-law, Lord Oxford, chose to impute to him, in a letter to that effect, the little countenance he received there, and even to charge him with having disparaged him before the Council. This charge Lord Burghley flatly denied, but as to his not obtaining any post through his interest, he answered, "That he perceived by it an opinion of his Lordship, that he thought it had been and might be in his power, considering, as he writ, that the managing of all causes passed through his hands, to strengthen his estate; for that he could never hear of a way proposed for his preferment." To which the Lord Treasurer replied, "My Lord, for a direct answer, I affirm for a truth, and that to be well proved, that your Lordship mistakes my power; howsoever you say that I manage the affairs; the trouble whereof is laid upon me, but no power to do myself, or any kin or friend, any good; but rather impeached and crossed, which I am taught these many years patiently to endure; yea, to conceal. That there have been no ways prepared for your preferment I do utterly deny; and can particularly make it manifest, by testimony of counsellors, how often I have propounded ways to prefer you to services, but why these could not take place, I must not particularly set down in writing, lest either I discover the hinderer, or offend yourself in shewing the allegations to impeach your Lordship from such preferment." This letter bears date December 15, 1587, and is signed, "Your Lordship's ready to deserve well, W. B." It is known that Lord Oxford was "a great spender," and as it was written of him, "set his patrimony flying," but his ill behaviour to Lady Oxford was worse than all.

In the course of this year Lord Burghley lost his Mother, a most venerable lady of eighty-seven years of age, of which she had lived a widow thirty-five. She was an heiress of the House of Eckington of Bourne or Burn [in comitat. Lincoln], as has been mentioned in our first volume; according to the inscription on her tomb, in St. Martin's Church at Stamford, she appears to have been "a very grave, religious, virtuous, and worthy matron, delighting exceedingly in works of piety and charity." The same inscription represents her also to have been "crowned with much honour and comfort, having lived, by God's great blessing, to see her children and her children's children to the fourth and fifth generations, and that in a plentiful and honourable succession, being a happy mother of that most honourable Sir WILLIAM CECIL, Knight of the Noble Order of the Garter, Lord BURGHLEY, Lord High Treasurer of England, who lieth here by her." The Queen took great care to express her condolence on the loss he had sustained, as may be seen in Strype's Annals, iii. b. ii. ch. xxii. under the year 1587. In Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. b. iii. No. lvi., may be seen an extract from the will of this pious and good lady, from which it appears that she had, before she died, a most humane and charitable consideration for the poor of Stamford and Bourne [or Burn], her native place; she had been accustomed, it seems, to appropriate 50*l.* a year (a large sum in those days), to be advanced in the way of loan to poor persons, to set them to work, or aid them in other ways; a benefaction she wished to be continued after her death, under the superintendence of her descendants, "the lords and owners of Burghley House for the time being."

In the obituary of this year, the name of that very eminent statesman, Sir Ralph Sadler, ought assuredly not to be omitted; a diligent servant of the same Kings and Queens whom Lord Burghley himself had lived to see, to know, and to serve. He died at the advanced age of eighty.* No man perhaps could have given a better account, in few words, of his talents and services, than that otherwise fanciful writer, the author of the British Worthies. [Lloyd.] Almost the last public service he had to perform, was the charge of the unfortunate Queen of Scots, on the final dismissal or removal of the Earl of Shrewsbury, in 1584. It appears to have been very irksome to him, and considering all that had past, relative to the royal captive, it is scarcely possible to conceive what the state of his feelings must have been; he had seen her in her very infancy; was intimately acquainted with, or rather perfectly well known, to her father and mother; he had been one of the Commissioners at York, and had most deliberately given sentence against her, as guilty of the sad crimes and moral delinquencies of which she was accused, as we have shewn in a former part of our work; and yet we find him, at the advanced age of 77, amusing himself at Tutbury with his hawks and falconers, and so indulgent to his charge, as to allow her to partake of the sport, to such a distance from the castle, as to alarm the Court; and Mary herself thanking Elizabeth, her "good sister," for making choice of such an ancient Counsellor of her acquaintance to attend about her." The more we read of the history of the sixteenth century, the more perplexed we find ourselves to account for the state of moral and social feelings of individuals. No man had more openly denounced Mary to be a murderess and an adulteress, than Sir Ralph Sadler, and yet he seems to have treated her with all the indulgence and respect he could, in compliance with her own wishes and designs; and to have shrunk, as far as he could do it, from the appointment imposed on him, and no wonder. When we reflect on the known opinions of such men as Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Walter Mildmay, and Lord Burghley, as to the safe keeping of the Queen of Scots in custody, and look to their moral characters, and the opinion generally entertained of their worth, integrity, and good dispositions; we cannot bring ourselves to believe, that Mary could be persecuted by such Statesmen for the mere sake of persecution, or to gratify the very worst passions of human nature. We are persuaded they all looked to the safety of Elizabeth, her crown and kingdom, with no farther ill-will to Mary, than as she was found to be at all times confederate with Elizabeth's bitterest and most deadly foes; a fact which, though she denied it to the last, was proved by the most palpable detections; this was decidedly the cause of her ruin.

* To shew how authors may be misled, who are not very circumspect in their proceedings, we must beg leave to correct a strange blunder (a misprint only of course) in the Biographical Memoir of Sir Ralph Sadler, by Sir Walter Scott, prefixed to the publication of his State Papers, Letters, &c.; Sir Ralph is there represented to have died in 1607, when he would have been at the least 100 years old; he certainly died in 1587.

But to finish our account of this aged Statesman, in the words of that curious and entertaining writer, Lloyd, we may say, that "he saw the interest of this state changed six times, and died an honest man; the crown put upon four heads, yet he continued a faithful subject; religion changed, as to the public constitution of it, five times, yet he kept the faith."

We are now arrived at the Annus Mirabilis, the wonderful, or admirable year, so called by very grave writers, and said to be foretold as such by an astronomer of Koningsberg, above a hundred years before, and noted by the German chronologers as the grand climacterical year of the world.*

"The rumours of wars, which before were but slight and small," says Camden, "began now to grow daily greater, and greater: and now the reports were no longer uncertain, but the universal and unanimous belief of all men carried it for certain truth,* that a most invincible Armada was rigged and prepared in Spain, against England, and that the famousest Captains and expertest leaders, and old soldiers, were sent for out of Italy, Sicily, yea, and out of America, into Spain."

God forbid that we should say any thing that should subject us to the suspicion of triumphing in the death of Mary, or of feeling less for her, than the generality of the world have done; on the contrary, perhaps no persons had ever greater occasion to lament that catastrophe, as a blot in the biography we have undertaken, calculated to render our whole work unpopular, though we must declare, that, upon a full and fair investigation of the subject, we still think both Elizabeth and her great Minister Lord Burghley ought to have the credit of being impelled to go to extremities by the force of circumstances; in short, by an imperious necessity; meaning thereby a case of personal self-defence.

Be this, however, as it may, most certain it is, that by the death of Mary, the gloomy and lowering dawn of this Annus mirabilis admitted a gleam of sunshine, not otherwise to have been expected. As long as Philip could pretend to be the friend and deliverer of the unfortunate Queen of Scots, his cause might be popular, perhaps, ought to have been popular; for though we fully believe, that she never could have been released by Elizabeth, without great danger to her own person, her crown, and her kingdom, yet we think she might and almost should have been rescued. We have been ourselves, often, almost tempted to cry out with Ronsard, (l'Apollon des François, as Mary herself used to call him,)—

> " Peuples, vous forlignez, aux armes nonchalants
> De vos ayeux Renaulds, Lancelots, et Rolands, > Qui prenoient d'un grand cœur pour les Dames querelle, > Les gardoient, les sauvoient, où vouz n'avez, François,
> Encore osé toucher ny vester le harnois
> Pour oster de servage une Royne si belle!"

But rescued she never was, though in captivity eighteen years, and never ex-

* See the letter from an English spy, in Mr. Ellis's Collection, 2d Series, iii. p. 134, dated Madrid, May 28, 1588. " I was," he writes, "in the number of the incredulous, yet now being in place where I may hear and see, I confess to be in the wrong, for now I am out of doubt they will in very deed that way; so that the lightning and thunder-clap will be both in a moment." Mr. Turner has very properly corrected Mr. Ellis's statement—the writer of this letter was no English spy, but one who actually wished for the success of the Armada.

ceedingly well guarded, though she was a Queen of France as well as of Scotland, and a firm, if not a bigoted Catholic.* If we ask why she was not rescued, the answer must be, because all her foreign pretended friends† had interests of their own to consult, which fettered their hands; all would have consented to pull down Elizabeth, and massacre her counsellors, but they could not agree as to the division of the spoil. This was, indeed, the safety of England, and the destruction of Mary, for among Elizabeth's own subjects, it was soon found that those who would have fought for Mary, would not fight for Philip. On the contrary, the Invincible Armada began speedily to arouse the spirit of Elizabeth's Catholic subjects, and stir them up, to defend their native country from subjection to the haughty Spaniard.

* Though there seems to have been a want of heroes to accomplish Mary's rescue, in times much nearer than our own to the age of Chivalry, yet was there not wanting a perfect heroine to avenge her death, could she but have accomplished her purposes. We wish we could give the story at length, in the original French, but it would be too long, and perhaps in some respects an English abridgment may do better.

Marguerite Lambrun was, as well as her husband, in the service of Mary, at the time of her execution; the horrid catastrophe had such an effect on the mind of M. Lambrun, that he sunk under it, and soon followed Mary to the grave. His wife vowed to revenge the deaths of both; insinuated herself into the English palace disguised as a man, and was in the very act of approaching the person of Elizabeth, when one of two loaded pistols she had about her, fell to the ground. She was instantly seized by the guards, and would have been hurried to prison, but that Elizabeth, hearing the tumult, desired to speak with, and interrogate the aggressor. Marguerite at once confessed the truth; declared she was a woman in disguise, come to avenge the death of her husband and her Royal mistress, by the murder of Elizabeth; that she had made efforts to overcome her passions and fatal purposes, but quite in vain. Elizabeth heard her with perfect composure, and calmly asked her to say, what she conceived to be her (Elizabeth's) duty, upon the hearing of such a case. Marguerite civilly asked in reply, whether she put that question to her as a Queen, or as a Judge. Elizabeth answered, As a Queen.—Then, said Marguerite, you should grant me a pardon. But, said Elizabeth, what assurance can you give me, that you will not abuse my mercy, and attempt the like on some future occasion. Madame, said Marguerite, a grace so fettered by precautions, is no grace at all. Elizabeth, turning to her Courtiers, observed, "Thirty years have I now reigned, and never before met with a person, to inculcate to me so noble a lesson;" and though she was strongly urged by her Council, as the story goes, to make an example of her, she insisted upon immediately granting her a pardon, unfettered with conditions, and finally, at her own request, caused her to be safely and honourably conveyed to her own country of France.—See Dictionnaire Historique, Art. Lambrun.

† In Scotland it may be allowed and concluded, that she had some real friends, but they could do nothing without France, and that dependence rendered them, in fact, obnoxious and dangerous to England; while it greatly lessened their consequence even in their own country.

It surely redounds to the credit of Elizabeth that she could always with confidence throw herself upon the loyalty of her subjects, whether they were Catholic or Protestant; she always seems to have been considered by them in cases of emergency, as a great Queen of this great kingdom; but while Mary lived, we must excuse in the Catholics, (considering the fulminating Bulls that had issued from Rome,) a leaning towards her claims, pretensions, and alleged rights; for our own part, we do most heartily forgive them, but must still look to the truth of history. England was now grievously threatened; so much so, that it must have required the utmost fortitude, and most collected and mature judgment, to avert the impending storm. There was one intervening expedient to be considered of, the possibility of treating for peace.

This alternative (if we may so call it), appears to have been in a peculiar (though not unusual) manner, submitted to Lord Burghley, and to have produced one of those able state papers for which he was so eminent, and which may be seen in the third volume of Strype's Annals, part ii. pp. 2, 3, &c. The leading article to be stipulated being, that the "people of the Low Countries, whom her Majesty hath defended, may not be impeached hereafter for anything done, but may enjoy their liberties and freedoms, and have the use of their religion;" but in truth, all efforts to negotiate a peace at this time were illusory. Philip solicited Elizabeth's mediation with the States as a blind, while his fleet was getting ready; and the mediation was accepted, to gain more time for England's defence.—See Rapin, Camden, &c.; "so as they seemed," says the latter author, "on both sides, to sew the fox's skin to the lion's." The Spaniard was much too confident of success; and what is somewhat remarkable, he seems to have been made to believe that Elizabeth was extremely unpopular, and that there was "great hope, that if the Catholic King would arm against her, her subjects would attempt somewhat remarkable for her destruction;" which suspicions, as Strype very justly says, "were as full of falsehood as of malice."

And indeed, this proscribed Queen appears to have felt no alarm at the mighty preparations making against her, so long as she might with safety appeal to the love and affections of her subjects; every evidence of which she received most thankfully and most seriously, acknowledging herself most bound to Almighty God that it had pleased him to bless her with such loving and dutiful subjects.

The proud King of Spain, in the meanwhile, was no less confident of success, not from the love of his subjects, but from the mighty force he had gathered together to invade the Queen's dominions; of which, indeed, he was so extravagantly vain, as to cause it to be made known throughout Europe, in a book written upon the "most happy Armada," as he called it, in many languages, Spanish, Latin, Italian, French, and Dutch, the title of which ran thus:—

"La felicissima Armada que el rey Felipe nuestro senior mando juntar en el puerto de la Ciudad de Lisbon en el regno de Portugal;" which book falling into the hands of Lord Burghley, he added notes thereto, and probably hastened its printing and publication;* for indeed it soon appeared in English, the only language apparently proscribed by Philip. The translator had but too much room afforded him to compare the vain boasts of the Spaniard with those of Sennacherib, King of Assyria, "as if he cried out," says he (with Rabshakah to the Jews), "Let not England deceive you, for it cannot deliver you out of my hand."

In this book there was an account given of the number of galleons, ships, pinnaces, sabres, galliasses, gallies, and other vessels which were assembled in the river of Lisbon.† The Duke of Medina Sidonia was appointed general and chief of the expedition; and, by the Spanish accounts, the fleet appears to have consisted of 130 ships of 57,868 tons; 19,295 soldiers, 8450 mariners, and 2088 slaves, besides many other lesser vessels of attendance.

* A paper was at the same time put forth, and which Strype has printed from the Burghley MSS., purporting to be an account of the proceedings between Spain and England, beginning at the access of Queen Elizabeth to the crown, in answer to a libel. This is an admirable paper; and, in our own estimation, so conformable to the actual truth of things, as to deserve implicit credit.—See Annals, vol. iii. part ii. Appendix, No. [lvii.], p. 554. We are the more inclined to say so, because Dr. Lingard, in his very partial History, is disposed to throw all the blame of aggression on Elizabeth; with him Philip is constantly the injured person; and the aid of his rebels in the Low Countries is, in his eyes, never to be forgiven. And yet, if ever there were a cause in which freedom and established right had to contend against the most odious tyranny, it was the case of the Belgians. We have not time nor space to tell the whole story in reply to Dr. Lingard, but let Voltaire tell it for us in his General History of Europe, if any reader would wish not to be beguiled.

† Were it not a known fact, the reader would perhaps think it incredible, that any court could have been so impolitic as to publish these things before hand, especially accompanied by such vain boasts. But it did the English great service, as some Catholics wrote to Mendoza; blaming also the severity of the Pope's Bull, Cardinal Allen's treason against his country, and the "way of Reformation by Force."

The whole account, however, ought to be read, as printed by Strype, in the Appendix to the third volume of his Annals, No. li. book ii.

Philip seems most decidedly to have had two objects in view: the one to conquer not England only, but the whole island of Great Britain; the other to extirpate heresy, and fully restore the Catholic religion. The first was avowed in some of their books, and the latter fully expressed, in the title of the Litany prepared for the occasion, which ran as follows:

"Litaniæ et preces pro felici successu classis Catholici Regis nostri Philippi adversus Angliæ HÆRETICOS, veræ fidei impugnatores."

Friars of many different orders were in the fleet, and the ships dedicated to a variety of Saints, as St. Martin, St. Philip, St. James, St. Anne, St. Christopher, &c. Very many adventurers (as they were called) were also on board the several ships, decorated with titles, but probably designed to take the places of all the Noblemen in England and Scotland. In short, as Bishop Carleton wrote, the Pope* and the Spaniard appear to have laid up all their hopes upon this year's and this fleet's destiny.

In the mean time, the Queen sent letters to the Lords Lieutenants of the several counties, to make large preparations of defence, it being plainly, as she stated, the intention of the enemy, not merely to invade, but make a conquest also of the realm, "wherein every man's particular estate was in the highest degree to be touched, in respect of country, liberty, wife, children, lands, life, and (that which was especially to be regarded) the profession of the true and sincere religion." The Nobility, also, in general, were called upon to make themselves ready to repair to the Queen, in defence of her person, when summoned, armed, themselves, their servants, and dependents. In all these measures of defence, the hand of Lord Burghley is constantly to be seen;† nor were his efforts vain; he soon found that the Catholics and Protestants equally dreaded and abhorred the tyranny of Spain, and were equally bent upon upholding the independency of the nation. The Dutch also determined to assist their ally.

* The Pope seems to have been the chief instigator of this mighty armament, and the principal encourager of Philip's rash designs, for it appears that the latter was much dissuaded from the undertaking, by his minister, Idiaquez, in which also the Duke of Parma is thought to have joined; but nothing could convince him that his power might fail, or that the conquest of England was a matter of any uncertainty. See Watson's Philip II.

† Of the Lord Treasurer's composure at this alarming period, a curious trait is recorded: "When the utter destruction of the English Government was confidently expected abroad, and greatly dreaded at home, Burghley appeared uniformly collected and resolute; and when the mighty preparations of the Spaniards were spoken of, in his presence, with apprehension, he only replied, with firmness, 'They shall do no more than God will suffer them.'"—Macdiarmid.

It was on the 29th of May, 1588, that the armada quitted Lisbon, under the especial auspices of the Holy Roman See; and that very remarkable Pontiff, Sixtus Quintus, who had nothing to contribute, says Rapin, but what the Popes were wont to supply on such occasions, namely, vows, prayers, and anathemas. To countenance, therefore, the King's undertaking, Sixtus thundered against Elizabeth a Bull, absolving her subjects from the oath of allegiance, and giving her kingdoms to the first that should seize them; while the Bulls of Pius V. and Gregory XIII. were renewed by Cardinal Allen, sent for that purpose into the Low Countries,* where the Duke of Parma, whatever his private opinions might be,† had caused an army of 30,000 men to be raised, and given commands to some of the English fugitives, the Earl of Westmoreland particularly, who were to join the Spanish fleet, and be landed in England.

Though it was impossible for Elizabeth to pretend to cope with Philip in numbers of ships or forces, yet she was, by the zeal of her faithful subjects, enabled to fit out a considerable fleet, the command of which was entrusted to a Catholic, the Lord Howard of Effingham, High Admiral of England, very

* See Camden. Sixtus, he says, published a regular crusade against Turks and infidels; and out of the treasury of the Church granted plenary indulgences to all who should contribute any help, which induced many Noblemen from all parts to enlist voluntarily. Of the Bull of Sixtus many copies were printed at Antwerp, and sent over to England, whereby the Queen was "accursed, and pronounced to be deprived of her crown;" but, as things turned out, and as it was shrewdly observed at the time, "whom the Pope cursed, God blessed."—See Carleton's Thankful Remembrancer.

† Watson, in his History of Philip II., as we have shewn, supposes the Duke of Parma to have been rather averse from the undertaking. Camden represents things otherwise, at least as to one course of proceeding, which, he says, "the Duke of Parma urged tooth and nail," p. 404. Rapin and Camden differ greatly as to the English fugitives. The former expressly says, Stanley and Westmoreland had commands, under the Duke; Camden, that their services were positively rejected, as unnatural, and therefore inauspicious. The Duke certainly professed to have a high veneration for Elizabeth, and to be governed in his proceedings, not by the Pope or his emissaries (for he had been charged with countenancing Cardinal Allen), but solely by the orders he received from the King his master. Certain it is, that after the overthrow of the Spanish fleet, the Spaniards threw much blame upon the Duke for negligence.

expert in sea affairs, having under him three of the best naval officers in the world, Drake, Hawkins, and Forbisher.* These were ordered to lie in the mouth of the Channel, while forty sail of English and Dutch, under Lord Henry Seymour, second son of the late Duke of Somerset, were left to watch the coast of Flanders, and prevent the Duke of Parma joining the Spaniards. So ardent in the cause were many of the nobility, that some chose, rather than appear inactive on so great an occasion, to accompany the fleet as volunteers, fitting out ships for that purpose at great expense; and among these, were both the sons of Lord Burghley, Sir Thomas and Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earls of Exeter and Salisbury.

The history of the defeat and dispersion of this mighty armament, and of the salvation of England thereby, has been so often written,† that we may well be spared the trouble of entering very far into the particulars;‡ we shall however observe, that so little had Philip calculated upon the nature, as well as the amount, of the difficulties he might have to encounter, that his ships had no sooner entered the narrow seas, than it was discovered, that the comparative lightness of the English vessels, and the superior alacrity of the English sailors, gave the latter every advantage, and that in fact, had nothing worse happened, it is probable that they would have met with their match at the very

* Camden gives Elizabeth the credit of having exercised her own clear judgment and discernment in assigning most excellent men, upon this occasion, to every particular place and charge. 405.

† For accounts of this extraordinary expedition, the reader may consult Watson's History of Philip II., the author having carefully compared the foreign historians, Grotius, Meteren, Campana, Ferreras, and Thuanus. Bishop Carleton's account in his Thankful Remembrancer is worth reading; Camden is pretty full; in the Appendix to Strype's Annals, many curious papers are to be seen, of both true and false accounts, of the issue of this great enterprise.

‡ Strype speaks of a poem in blank verse, entitled "Elizabetha Triumphans," as containing the fullest account of the expedition, of the Camp at Tilbury, and of the Queen's actions, speeches, and behaviour there. It was set forth, he tells us, by I. A.—Post Victoriam Gloria. The Title at large, and specimen he gives of the verses, do not speak highly in recommendation of it; but the work is unknown to us.—The author's name was Aske. Queen Elizabeth has had the credit given her, of being the occasion of people's eating goose for dinner on Michaelmas-day; for having feasted upon a savoury one at Sir Neville Umfraville's, on her way to Tilbury, and calling for a half-pint bumper of Burgundy, to drink destruction to the Spanish fleet, she had no sooner drank it, than the news of its dispersion arrived; to commemorate at once the day, the dinner, and the victory, she ever afterwards, we are told, eat goose on St. Michael's day, in which she was followed by the Court. Dr. Drake, however, has discovered an earlier date for this prevailing custom.—See his Shakspeare.

mouth of the channel.* It was however judged wisest, not to encounter them there, but to let them pass onward and follow them, that their return might be rendered impossible, and their embarrassment the greater, as the sea-room became contracted. This manœuvre seems entirely to have succeeded, for after taking some of their hinder ships and stragglers, and finding that the Spanish fleet was making for the coast of Flanders, in order to set the Duke of Parma free from the blockade under Seymour; Lord Howard, after sustaining one attack, in which the Spaniards through the unwieldiness of their ships gained no advantage, followed them to Calais, where they had been obliged to cast anchor; and not willing to let so good an opportunity slip, he sent in among them during the night, no fewer than eight fire-ships, which threw them into such terror and confusion, that instantly cutting their cables, they put to sea, to avoid the impending danger; and though the Spanish Admiral had ordered every ship to return to her station as soon as the danger was passed, and made a signal for that purpose, yet none made any attempt to obey; some were driven to the North, and some upon the shallows of Flanders, where they were in great danger, not only from the sands, but from the assaults of the English, who played upon them with their cannon, and disabled many, while two of the galeons fell into the hands of the Zealanders; at length it was determined that they should abandon the enterprise, and endeavour to find a passage home by the way of Scotland and Ireland, as some of the ships had already taken that course. But here the elements became their enemies; they sustained great damage by winds and storms, and many ships were absolutely lost on the coasts both of Ireland and Scotland, so that of the whole of this invincible, and really formidable armada, fifteen great ships were lost in the engagements in the Channel, and seventeen on the coasts of Ireland, being in all thirty-two ships, and 10,185 men.†

The following account was pretended to have been sent by one in England,

* According to Camden's account, p. 403, Philip had been counselled to avoid the narrow seas, and proceed directly against England, which he might do by a "free and open sea," and a shorter journey than would be required for reducing the Netherlands.

† We must be excused repeating the well-known story of the following pasquinade, since there is no knowing who may read it for the first time, in this particular work; but it seems to be very certain, that upon the defeat or dispersion of this extraordinary armament, the following was exhibited on Pasquil in the city of Rome. "Pontificem mille annorum indulgentias largiturum esse de plenitudine potestatis suæ, siquis certo sibi indicaverit, quid sit factum de classe Hispanica. Quo abierit; in cœlumne sublata; an ad Tartara detrusa; vel in aëre alicubi pendeat; an in aliquo mari fluctuat?"

to Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador at Paris. "How that famous fleet was driven out of our seas, to the further north parts of Scotland, and driven by tempests beyond the isles of Orkney, a place above sixty degrees from the North Pole; an unacquainted place for the young gallants of Spain, that never had felt storms on the seas, or cold weather in August. And about those north islands, their mariners and soldiers died daily by multitudes, as by their bodies cast on land did appear." See the whole of this letter, in the Appendix to Strype's Annals, iii. No. lii. This was probably intended as a banter upon Mendoza, the Spanish Minister, who had been expelled England for his bad practices, and had prematurely endeavoured to persuade the world, that England had been beaten; absolutely procuring such a report to be drawn up and published in French, Italian, and Spanish. Strype has briefly enumerated the evils that would probably have ensued, had the Spanish enterprise succeeded; viz. a fearful massacre of Protestants every-where; the deposition of the Queen, accompanied in all likelihood, with "some direful usage;" new rulers to be set over the nation, and the ancient government and constitution overturned. It appears from one account sent to Lord Burghley, that Philip, in case of his meeting with success, had intended to send Elizabeth to Rome, that the Pope might dispose of her as it should please him. "What the Pope should have done with her, besides the putting her into the Inquisition," says Strype, "we are left to guess." We may not repeat what Sixtus Vth. used to say, of an acquaintance between himself and Elizabeth, [Bayle, art. Elizabeth, note Q.;] but in fact he had a high opinion of her undaunted spirit, and distinguished talents; he considered her as one of three who alone were qualified to reign, himself and Henry IV. being the other two. In the report to which we are referring, there is a curious character drawn of Lord Burghley himself; as of a man so experienced, and grounded with so deep a judgment, as his piercing eye foresees and looks into all accidents and sequences that may prejudice or further his purposes and intentions in any matter he takes in hand, or is to be handled in government of the realm, and practised and followed against any other state. A very exact character, and for that age, a very complimentary one, when "dissimulation," as an able writer has observed, "instead of being reprobated, was respected, and even commended as the concomitant of sagacity and wisdom."—Benger's Memoirs of Mary, Queen of Scots. Not that we think Lord Burghley chargeable with greater dissimulation, than was, as near as could be, absolutely necessary, to counteract, as we have elsewhere expressed ourselves, the dissimulation and hidden purposes of others. Throgmorton, after much conversation with the Queen of Scots in France, 1562, actually observes, in his letters in the Cabala, as a matter of praise, that she "was inferior to none in dissimulation."—Knox, a less favourable judge, bestowed upon her similar commendations; in short, the politics of that age resembled a game at whist, in which the utmost pains are expected to be taken, to detect what your adversary is about, and by skilful play win the game, in defeating all his plans and purposes, and not without some finesse occasionally, to hide the player's own purposes, and mislead the adversary. In one of Mr. Faunt's letters to Mr. Anthony Bacon, to be seen in Birch's Memoirs, speaking of the mission of a French Minister to Scotland, in the year 1582, he says, "La Motte Fenelon is n wly arrived here from France; his errand is to go into Scotland pour brouiller les cartes, and to the Scots Queen; but it will be hardly granted him."—He did go, however, but with one to watch his shufflings, which was all fair.—See an account of these embassies, in Dr. Birch's note, vol. i. p. 33.

It would be wrong not to take account of what was passing on land, while these things took place on the seas. We have hitherto followed Strype and Rapin, their statement of proceedings being very short, yet sufficiently clear. We shall now refer to Camden, as perhaps the shortest account of all: "For land-service," he says, "there were dispersed along the southern coasts, 20,000 men, besides which, two armies were raised, of choice, well-disciplined, and experienced men; the one under the command of the Earl of Leicester, consisting of 1000 horse, and 22,000 foot, which encamped at Tilbury, not far from the Thames mouth (for the enemy was fully resolved to set first upon London), the other under the leading of the Lord Hunsdon, consisting of 34,000 foot, and 2000 horse, to guard the Queen's person. When we compare these armaments, with the reports made to Philip, of England's hopeless state, that "it had no forts nor defences; that it was unprovided of commanders, soldiers, cavalry, and munition; bare of wealth and friends; that there were many in all parts of the realm, addicted to the Romish religion, who would presently join their forces with his; briefly, that so great was the strength of the Spaniard both by sea and land, and so unmatchable the valour of the Spaniards, that no man durst oppose him." When, we say, these accounts are duly compared, it is impossible not to be struck with admiration at the surprising energy displayed by the English, and the spirit and resolution with which all ranks of persons came forward, to defend their country and their Sovereign. "No words," says Rapin, "are able to express the great forwardness of the people, in their zealous love and duty towards their Sovereign at this juncture."*

And certainly the juncture was one, exceedingly formidable to Elizabeth; for her crown and her life lay both at stake. Hitherto, through a line of policy common to all the states of Europe in those days, by keeping her enemies occupied, and watching all their motions, she had prevented attacks at home, but the time was now come, as Rapin says, that her right must be exposed to the chances of war. "If ever she discovered ability," says the same author, "it was on this important occasion; far from shewing the least faint-heartedness, she encouraged her people by her looks, her resolution, her affability—she looked to every thing with a wonderful prudence, and a presence of mind, rarely to be found in the greatest men, and which gained her the admiration and praises of all the world." It was while the army lay encamped at Tilbury, that the Queen, "with a masculine spirit," says Camden, took a view of it in person, † riding through the ranks, with a truncheon in her hand, sometimes with a martial pace, another while, gently like a woman, encouraging in an incredible manner the hearts of her captains and soldiers, by her presence and kind speeches. ‡

* The City of London being desired to furnish 5000 men and 15 ships, granted 10,000 men, and 30 ships.

† "See a Queen," says the great Lord Bacon, "that when her realm was to have been invaded by an army, the preparation whereof was like the travel of an elephant, the provisions were infinite, the setting forth whereof was the terror and wonder of Europe: it was not seen that her cheer, her fashion, her ordinary manner was any thing altered; not a cloud of that storm did appear in that countenance, wherein peace doth ever shine, but with excellent assurance and advised security, she inspired her council, animated her nobility, redoubled the courage of her people, still having this noble apprehension, not only that she would communicate her fortune with them, but that it was she that would protect them, not they her; which she testified by no less demonstration than her presence in camp."—Bacon's Discourse in Praise of his Sovereign.

‡ Though one speech delivered by Elizabeth is known almost by heart, to most readers of history, it is too characteristic of that extraordinary woman, to be omitted: it was addressed to the army, on the banks of the Thames, where the invasion was expected to take place.

"My loving people,

"We have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety, to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes for fear of treachery, but I assure you I do not desire to live to distrust my faithful and loving people.

"Let tyrants fear, I have always so behaved myself, that under God, I have placed my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts and goodwill of my subjects, and therefore I am come Upon this very memorable occasion, her Majesty rode on a milk-white horse, which she afterwards gave to Lord Burghley,* and the portrait of which is still to be seen in the Hall of Hatfield House, the seat of his Lordship's lineal descendant, the Marquess of Salisbury.

The defeat and discomfiture of this great enterprise, on the issue of which, no doubt, every thing valuable to England in Church and State depended, was, as might be expected, the subject of great rejoicings and public thanksgivings. Philip, however, in the meanwhile, it must be acknowledged, took the disappointment better than could have been supposed,† but not in such a amongst you, as you see, at this time, not for my recreation and disport, but being resolved in the midst and heat of battle, to live or die among you all, to lay down for my God, and for my kingdoms, and for my people, my honour, and my blood even in the dust.

"I know I have the body but of a weak and feeble woman, but I have the heart and stomach of a King, and of a King of England too, and think foul scorn that Parma or Spain, or any Prince of Europe, should dare to invade the borders of my realm; to which rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms, I myself will be your General, Judge, and Rewarder of every one of your virtues in the field.

"I know already, for your forwardness you have deserved rewards and crowns, and we do assure you on the word of a Prince they shall be duly paid you. In the mean time my Lieutenant-general shall be in my stead, than whom never Prince commanded a more noble or worthy subject, not doubting but by your obedience to our General, by your concord in the camp, and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over those enemies of God, of my kingdoms, and of my people."

Dr. Lingard thinks this speech might have been prepared, but could not have been delivered, because the enemy was fled, but the alarm might not be over; since their quick determination to steer northward, is known to have excited a pretty general idea that they would land in Scotland, and that James would receive them there, in a friendly manner: no unreasonable expectation, considering all things.

* In a letter from Leicester to Lord Shrewsbury, from the camp, dated August 15, he writes, "Our gracious mistress has been here with me to see her camp and people, which so inflamed the hearts of her good subjects, as I think the weakest person amongst them is able to match the proudest Spaniard that dares land in England.—My Lord, this gentleman (the bearer) has seen our camp, and a fair show I made my Lord Treasurer, who came from London to see us."—Lodge, ii. No. ccxxii.

† This at least is Camden's account; others state tht being at mass when the account came, as soon as it was over, he swore a great oath, protesting that he would waste and consume his crown, even to the value of one of the candlesticks on the altar, utterly to ruin Elizabeth and England; while his priests laid the blame on his lenity towards the Moors, in not expelling them his country, and expecting to prevail against English heretics, while he harboured in his own kingdom, Mahometan apostates.—See the History of the Expulsion of the Moriscos out of Spain.

manner, as to lull to rest the suspicions of the English government; so that the Parliament which was assembled early in the ensuing year came to a resolution to assist her Majesty with their lives, lands, and goods in her quarrel with the King of Spain, and the Lords in particular agreed to a declaration, said to be drawn up by Lord Burghley, offering "with all manner of duty and willingness to be ready with all their power, to serve her Majesty, as well by offensive wars abroad as defensive at home, whensoever she shall find it meet and profitable for her realm to denounce an open war against the said King and his adherents." *

Notwithstanding the alarming situation in which the kingdom stood, during this memorable year, from the threatened invasion; the preparations against which by land and sea, appear to have all emanated from Lord Burghley, † as the most watchful guardian of the realm, he was not free from his usual trouble, of being called upon to settle some very unpleasant disputes in the Universities (Cambridge particularly), as well as in the Church. The details of which, however, must be looked for in the several publications of Strype, as it appears to have been one of his annual cares, and not of such a nature as to bear perpetual repetition; ‡ especially as the several cases could only serve to shew the

* This declaration, which is not in D'Ewes, Strype has printed in his Annals, from Lord Burghley's own draft of it, Annals, iii. part ii. p. 55.

† Among other preparations for which he seems unwittingly to have made himself responsible, is the invitation to Sir Edward Kelly, in Germany, who had the credit of having discovered the Philosopher's stone, to repair forthwith to England, to give the Queen, in this great crisis, the benefit of his admirable art: Strype seems very reasonably to conclude, that he was more wanted for purposes of information.—See this case in Strype's Annals, 1588, and the Letters and Papers relating to it, vol. iv., Nos. 1, 2, 3, &c.

‡ The case of Digby, senior fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, is rather a remarkable one, and should be read in Strype's Life of Whitgift; the Chancellor and Archbishop having decided against the Master and Fellows, for too great rigour in enforcing their statutes, and though the latter had the support of the Earls of Warwick, Leicester, and Essex; the grounds of the Chancellor's determination seem to have been some notorious defects in the course of the proceedings; "such as," (to use the Archbishop's own words to Leicester), "if they might be tolerated, should bring too violent a government into the College, and breed many inconveniences." Digby's great offence was, being an abettor of Popery; but Whitaker, the master, took the occasion of a much more trifling offence to expel him the College, thereby appearing to act on motives of mere resentment and private malice. Though the Chancellor, however, decided against Whitaker, it seems in no manner to have abated the respect borne by that learned divine and professor towards his Lordship, since in this very year he dedicated to Lord Burghley his celebrated "Disputatio de sacra Scriptura;—contra Bellarminum," &c. &c. feverish state of men's minds, the unpleasant warmth with which all parties maintained their own opinions, and the impossibility there seemed to be of arriving at that unity, which the Queen judged to be necessary to the peace of the kingdom; the Established Church having two parties opposed to her, as adverse as possible to each other, but each quarrelling with what had undoubtedly received the fullest sanction of the legislative powers, each questioning the Queen's Ecclesiastical Supremacy, the one generally, the other as to its particular extent. The Papists secretly plotting another revolution, for the restoration of their religion; the Puritans in their zeal against Popery and Episcopacy, interrupting the harmony that should have prevailed amongst Protestants at so trying a crisis, and too often calling down severities upon their own heads, by endeavouring to force their platform and Genevan discipline upon a Church which stood upon a different footing of reformation, and had in its new but fixed state, received the approbation, and excited the admiration of many learned foreigners. It was greatly to be lamented, therefore, that such disagreements should prevail, to the hurt and hindrance of the great cause of Protestantism, in its struggle with the Church of Rome; but it was very long indeed, as every body now knows, before these disturbances could be allayed and quieted, by a full display of that essentially mild spirit of genuine Protestantism, which, without abandoning the wholesome system of a Church Establishment, has, by the Act of Toleration, and similar Statutes from time to time, afforded every reasonable security to scrupulous consciences, and totally done away with those hateful instruments of persecution, prevalent, we lament to say, beyond the age in which Lord Burghley lived, racks, and all engines of torture. But allowances must be made, and men must be judged of, according to the standard of their own time, and the circumstances in which they were placed. There is no other way of judging properly of the course of public events, or the characters of individuals, in the sixteenth century; during the whole of which, and much longer in this kingdom, as it happened, the minds of men may be said to have been in a perpetual state of revolutionary effervescence. All parties incurred the blame of great severities, but the complaints made against the Government should be carefully weighed and considered, to come at the truth. Those of both parties who would not conform to the settled order of things, were in the way to become disturbers,* if they interfered too far with those who could, and would conform; while it is not to be doubted that their own systems were as domineering and intolerant in principle as any. Of the system of the Papists, there had been sufficient experimental proof afforded in all countries, since the beginning of the century, to go no higher; but the system of the Puritans was nearly as exclusive a one, and the conduct of some of that denomination during this year, in their attacks upon Episcopacy, extremely rude and irritating. No Prelate has been more severely censured for his conduct towards the Puritans than Whitgift, and even Lord Burghley seems to have judged him to be occasionally too sharp; but he had provocations given him at this time, that seem quite indefensible; of so scurrilous and vulgar a description that a slight specimen only we should conceive would be sufficient to satisfy the reader. For this was the year in which Episcopacy had to bear the assaults of the individuals or confederacy,* that attacked it, under the offensive title of Martin Marprelate, of whose bad taste and ill-breeding, the following is a sad and deplorable example. It is the introduction to a work purporting to be a reply to one written by Dr. Bridges, Dean of Salisbury, in defence of the Establishment, and it begins thus: O, read over Dr. John Bridges, for it is a worthy work: or, an Epitome of the first book of the right worshipful volume, written against the Puritans, and the Defence of the Noble Clergy, by as worshipful a Priest, J. Bridges, Presbyter, Priest or Elder, Dr. of Divinitie, and Dean of Sarum. Wherein the arguments of the Puritans are wisely prevented; that when they come to answer Mr. Doctor, they must needs say something that hath been spoken.

"Compiled for the behoof and overthrow of the parsons, fickars, and currats; which have larnt their Catechisms, and are past grace. By the reverend and worthy Martin Marprelate, Gentleman; and dedicated to Confocation house, &c. Printed over Sea in Europe, within two furlongs of a bouncing Priest."

It is dedicated to the right puissant and terrible priests, my clergy-masters of Popish, Lutheran, and Calvinistic clergy to alter the public prayers as any of them thought proper, for each had the same right, and each was entitled to the same liberty." A fine source of dissension!

* Four of the most hot-headed of the party, Perry, Throgmorton, Eudale [Udal], and Fenner, formed an association and clubbed their talents, to put out pamphlets against the Bishops; an account of which may be seen in Collier, ii. 606, Strype, &c. Camden, &c. &c.; but for all the papers relating to Perry's case, Strype should be pa.ticularly consulted, particularly his Annals, 1588, &c. and his Life of Whitgift.

the Confocation-house, whether fickers-general, paltripolitans, or any other of the holy league of subscription. The date is not less curious. "Anno Pontificatus vestri quinto;" [meaning the Archbishop Whitgift, who had now, Ann. 1588, been five years removed to the See of Canterbury]; adding, "and I hope ultimo of all the English Popes: by your learned and worthy brother, Martin Marprelate." Had there been wit enough in this rare piece, to excuse the vulgarity of it, it might have been more tolerable;* but it is certainly as destitute of all wit, as of all good manners.†

The Archbishop who had perused and approved the Dean's Book, thus expressed in a more dignified and proper style, his commendation of it: "That he knew the sufficiency of it caused these men thus to storm; as not being able otherwise to answer it. Which made them so bitterly to inveigh against his person: and therefore, Si insectari personam deploratæ causæ signum est, istorum causa est deploratissima;" a very just remark.

But the very system of the Puritans was intolerant, a case that should be better understood than it generally is, since in the celebrated History of the

* Not that it could be justifiable even in that case; "Non est major confusio," says the great Lord Bacon, speaking of those very times, "quam serii et joci." The majesty of religion, and the contempt and deformity of things ridiculous, are things as distant, as things can be. The same great man, has the following fair remark on the bold assertions of the Puritans: "If that which you set down as an assertion, you would deliver by way of advice, there were reverence due to your counsel, whereas faith is not due to your affirmation. St. Paul was content to speak thus, Ego non Dominus, I and not the Lord. Et secundum consilium meum, according to my counsel; but now men do too lightly say, Non Ego sed Dominus; Not I but the Lord,—yea, and bind it with an heavy denunciation of his judgments, to terrify the simple." There are many important remarks to be found in these Essays of Bacon on Church Controversies; in which, Lord Bacon, while he blames the Puritans, gives good advice to the Bishops. He professes himself to be a favourer of episcopacy, in the following pointed terms: "For the government of Bishops, I for my part, not prejudging the precedents of other reformed Churches, do hold it warranted by the word of God, and by the practice of the ancient Church in the better times, and much more convenient for kingdoms, than parity of ministers, and governed by synods. But then farther it is to be considered, that the Church is not now to plant and build; but only to be pruned from corruption, and to be repaired and restored in some decays." He blames those Puritans greatly, in his Essay on Church Controversies, "who call in as it were to their aid, certain mercenary bands, which impugn Bishops, and other ecclesiastical dignities, to have the spoil of their endowments and livings. Of these I cannot speak too hardly. It is an intelligence between incendiaries and robbers, the one to fire the house, the other to rob it."

Puritans by Mr. Neal, referring to these times, many things exceedingly injurious to the memory of the great foundress of our Protestant religion, are to be found, as well as very partial representations of those who acted by her authority, her ministers and servants; as it has been very rightly observed. But indeed Mr. Neal's reflections were ably controverted in a work,* bearing the following title, "A Vindication of the Government, Doctrine, and Worship of the Church of England established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, against the injurious Reflections of Mr. Neal in his late History of the Puritans, together with a detection of many false quotations and mistakes in that performance, London, 1740." This comes closer to the point, than Hooker's great Work, and the author having had the advantage of Mr. Neal's revival of the controversy carried on in Lord Burghley's days, and many practical evidences of the spirit of Puritanism in the century following, to refer to, and drawing his proofs from the very words of some of their own party, ought, in the spirit of its own selected motto, Audi alteram partem, to be read by all who would obtain a clear history of the dispute. The points insisted upon by the author are these:

1. That Queen Elizabeth was really a Protestant, and wisely fixed upon the most proper and Scriptural, as well as the most Catholic and comprehensive establishment of the Protestant religion.

2. That the Puritans were neither desirous of a toleration for themselves, nor willing to grant it to any others: but solely aimed at the establishing their own platform, and persecuting their fellow-subjects and fellow-Protestants.

3. That they were treated with great indulgence and favour, and allowed to enjoy many and considerable preferments in the Church.

4. That their own irregular conduct obliged the Government to secure itself by keeping a stricter hand upon them; and that after all, great distinction was made between peaceable Non-conformists and those that endeavoured the overthrow of Church and State; that the one were indulged, while the other were restrained.

The author, looking back upon the times of which we are writing, very justly observes, that these disputes, by dividing the Protestants, weakened that interest in the very infancy of it, when its whole united strength seemed scarce sufficient against Popery. And nothing could be more true; yet he speaks impartially. "If all the proceedings," says he, "in a long reign of forty-four years, were not equally praiseworthy, it is not to be wondered at; human frailties attend persons of every rank; and it will appear that the Puritans were as far from being faultless as their superiors. It is but justice, therefore, to divide the blame, and let each side have its proper share." He notices another very material point that should be taken into account. In their zeal against Popery, the Puritans quite overlooked, or pretended to overlook, the middle line which the Queen, and her chief ministers, and the Prelates sought to keep; and because the latter would not condescend to the extreme demands of Calvinism, branded them at once with the odious name of Popery; though "if," to cite the author's own words, "her Majesty, upon very weighty reasons, was for retaining some few ancient ceremonies, it had been much more decent, as well as just, to so great a Queen, to have said that she inclined more to the Lutheran than Calvinistic Protestants, in the external polity of the Church, though she never came up to the former."* Instead of this, Mr. Neal gives her credit only for affecting to keep a middle way between Popery and Puritanism, though more inclinable to the former: whereas there were other Protestants, who, without any affectation, to use their own expressions, steered such a middle course, and to whom Popery and the platform were nearly alike objectionable. Nor was this middle course at all a matter of indifference to the Calvinists; they were as unwilling to have Elizabeth a Lutheran as a Papist, insomuch that, at the very beginning of her reign, the Helvetian Divines, the Fathers of the Puritans, declaimed against nothing more than the possibility of Elizabeth's conforming to the Augustan Confession, though she had certainly more inducement to conciliate the German than the Helvetian Protestants. The simple question of Episcopacy may be said to remain a question to this day, since the northern and southern parts of the kingdom are under different establishments. It is quite enough to know, that both parties do really and conscientiously think they have the Scriptures, Apostolical authority, and primitive usage in their favour; and the Legislature has gone as far as it could to sanction, rather than condemn, both Episcopacy and Presbyterianism. But, in Elizabeth's days, such a compromise seemed impossible; and Government, which had made its decision, might reasonably be expected to resent, in frequent instances, so vexatious an opposition as is known to have taken place; still, indulgence was shewn when it could be shewn, and by no one more than by Lord Burghley; endeavouring, as it would seem, constantly to mediate between the offending Puritans and the offended Bishops; in doing which, perhaps, he might sometimes question the prudence of the latter, though he certainly wished to bring the former to a conformity, for the sake of peace and unity, and to frustrate the efforts of the Papists, who built their hopes much upon these divisions, and therefore strove to foment them all they could. Elizabeth, besides, had no reason to expect this opposition of the Puritans, since Bullinger, one of the most respectable Helvetian Divines, had very early declared, that the Queen's adoption of her brother Edward's reformation satisfied him, and others of his persuasion. Satisfacit piis Edvardi Reformatio. This was the reformation the Queen professedly adopted, and it certainly should have served to protect her as well from the imputation of being a Papist,* as from the charge of not being in considerable agreement with the wisest and most moderate of the Genevan or Zurichian schools.†

* Had she been so inclined to Popery as the Puritans pretended, and yet wished to retain her supremacy, why did she not adopt her father's Reformation rather than her brother's? This is a question that might reasonably be asked, especially as she was surrounded with some of her father's Counsellors; instead of which, the first minister she appointed was Cecil, her brother's Secretary.

† The fate of Episcopacy, as a stumbling-block to the Puritans, is odd enough. It is probable, that, in their zeal against Popery, they allowed themselves to be beguiled by a Popish fiction. Burnet has, with great ingenuity, shewn, that the elevation of the Priestly, and depression of the Episcopal order, originated, in all likelihood, with the Schoolmen and the Canonists, who came to similar conclusions with very different designs. The former having set up the great mystery of transubstantiation, judged it necessary to exalt the workers of this great miracle (of turning the Host into God), in such a way as to leave none above them; and therefore, in fact, to make them equal to Bishops; while the Canonists, in their eagerness to exalt the Papacy, did all they could to bring down the power of the Bishops; both Schoolmen and Canonists thus conspiring, though for different ends, to reduce the two orders nearer and nearer to an equality. But, by almost all accounts, an equality was contrary to the primitive order of things; and, what is rather extraordinary, we shall find Calvin, in the fourth chapter of the fourth Book of his Institutions, as forward as any to acknowledge, that before the Papacy, for fear of dissensions arising from an equality, in every city, Bishops were chosen to preside, in every province Archbishops, and in the Council of Nice, Patriarchs were put over Archbishops; and he concludes with saying (after some objections to the term Hierarchy), that we shall find that the ancient Bishops were willing to frame no other form of governing the Church than that which God had prescribed in his word. The passage is certainly very remarkable, and deserves to be copied.

" Quibus docendi munus injunctum erat, eos omnes nominabant Presbyteros. Illi ex suo numero in singulis civitatibus unum eligebant, cui specialiter dabant titulum Episcopi, ne ex æqua-

We must not venture farther into these discussions at present; but as, in the midst of much more important concerns this year, Lord Burghley was, as usual, called upon to decide disputes of the above nature, and the renowned champion of Puritanism, Martin Marprelate, took the field, in form, against Episcopacy, we have judged it fit to refer the reader to what we conceive to be a truly rational and correct account of the precise bearings of the case. We must confess that Lord Burghley himself seems to have been occasionally deceived, especially when he judged the Prelates, and especially Whitgift, had gone too far in exacting subscription to particular articles; whereas the Puritans' platform was quite as strict, if not more so, the following being the terms of admission into their congregation:

" For the avoiding of all heresies and sects in our churches, every one, as well men as women, which desire to be received, shall make a declaration, or confession of their faith, before Ministers and Elders, shewing themselves fully to consent and agree with the doctrine of the Church, and submitting themselves to the discipline of the same, and the same to testify by subscribing thereto, if they can write." " And that every member of the congregation do not refuse to render a declaration of their faith, before the Ministers and Elders,† whensoever they shall by them be thereunto required."

litate, ut fieri solent, dissidia nascerentur; quod autem singulæ provinciæ unum habebant inter Episcopos Archiepiscopum. Quod item in Nicena Synodo constituti sunt Patriarchæ qui essent ordine dignitate Archiepiscopis superiores, id ad disciplinæ conservationem pertinebat. Gubernationem sic constitutam nonnulli Hierarchiam vocârunt nomine (ut mihi videtur) improprio; certe Scripturis inusitato. Verum si rem omisso vocabulo intuemur, reperiemus veteres Episcopos non aliam regendæ Ecclesiæ formam voluisse fingere ab ea quam Deus verbo suo præscripsit."

We must not deceive the reader, or misrepresent Calvin. In the book we cite, the above passages thus brought together, are far apart in the original; and we must confess we dislike that mode of citation. Calvin did not mean to give up the identity (if we may so speak), of Bishops and Prebsyters, but he certainly very plainly admits the hazard of equality, and the superiority in degree of Bishops, Archbishops, and Patriarchs; distinctions rudely scoffed at by many at this time, though Calvin regards them as consistent with the Word of God, and notes their antiquity, the title of the chapter whence the extracts above are taken being, De statu veteris Ecclesiæ et ratione gubernandi quæ in usu fuit ante Papatum."

* " These lay Elders are to judge, as they say, according to the word of God; their own sense of it, they always mean." " By this means, a few tradesmen in cities, or farmers in country parishes, might brand a man for a sinner or a heretic, being judges of opinions as well as actions, according to their own arbitrary and sovereign determination." In fact, in these holy Synods or

But what can be said to the charity of the Puritans, when it is known that the prayers objected to in the ritual of Edward and Elizabeth, were especially these: "That it may please God to have mercy upon ALL men; that it may please God to preserve ALL that travel by land or by water, ALL women labouring with child, ALL sick persons and young children, and to shew pity upon ALL prisoners and captives?"

The objection made was pretty strong.

"They pray also," say they, "that all men may be saved without exception; and that all travelling by sea and land may be preserved, Turks and traitors not excepted—in all their order of service there is no edification—they pray that all men may be saved!"

These things being taken from their own books, may surely serve to prove the superiority of the established ritual on the score of charity, as addressed to a Deity "who willeth not the death of a sinner, but that ALL should be converted and live."* In fact, the Established Religion was, in all its forms, charitable and comprehensive, which proved to be faults in the eyes both of Papists and Puritans; but when denounced as such, in the face of the people, were the Bishops to be silent, and yield to the charge? and not support the Establishment against its traducers? We are sorry to think any extreme severity should have been practised; but there was certainly great provocation given, and never more perhaps than in this year, in the scurrilous attacks of Martin Marprelate, the very name betokening the desired overthrow of the Episcopal government and established discipline, to make room for the Genevan platform, in comparison, to say the least of it, a rigid narrow scheme. They sought not toleration, but a change; the absolute overthrow of their "proud enemies," as they were styled in the famous admonition to Parliament, and thus particularized: "The Lordly Lords, Archbishops, Bishops, Suffragans, Deans, University Doctors, and Bachelors of Divinity, Archdeacons, Chancellors, and the rest of that proud generation, whose kingdom must down." And again, "Overthrow," say they, "without hope of restitution, the Court of Faculties; remove homilies, articles, injunctions, and that prescript order of service made out of the Mass Book." This was a continual objection, that some of our Consistories, the best chance a man had, was that his case was to be determined by a majority of ruling Elders.

* 2 Peter iii. 9. "Not willing that any should perish, but that ALL should come to repentance." See also Ezekiel xxxiii. ii. 1 Tim. ii. 4.

prayers were taken out of the Mass Book; but was not this a proof that, in casting off Popish superstitions, our Reformers were anxious to retain whatever could not give offence, and the people had been used to? "The true and only question for a peaceable Christian," says the author we have referred to, "is not who has used a prayer, but what the prayer is? Can any man of sense think it sinful to offer up the following beautiful petition in the English tongue, only because a Popish priest used a Latin prayer to the same purpose:"

"Lord of all power and might, who art the author and giver of all good things, graft in our hearts the love of thy name; increase in us true religion; nourish us with all goodness, and of thy great mercy keep us in the same, through Jesus Christ our Lord?"

The Puritans, and especially Martin Marprelate, were against the toleration of all such abuses, as they called them. "This learned Discourse [which he had before been speaking of] is a book allowed by ALL the Puritan preachers of the land, who would have all the remnants and relics of Antichrist banished out of the Church, and not so much as a Lord Bishop (no not his Grace himself), dumb minister (no not dumb John of London himself), Non-Resident, Archdeacon, Abbey-lubber, or any such loiterer, tolerated in our ministry."*

To say nothing of the politeness of these terms, we would only wish to compare the systems; the one professedly endeavouring to comprehend as many

* Such language was certainly very disgraceful, but the more so as applied to persons in authority, when compared with the language in which they set forth their own praises; those who conformed to, or held by the Establishment, were "petty Popes, popelings, Papists, Popish priests, Antichrists, petty Antichrists, dumb dogs, idle drones, worse than monks and fryars;" while among themselves none were to be heard of, but the pious, the learned, worthy, painful, faithful, eminent, and godly; while their platform was held to be in their own account, "the venerable doctrine of discipline;" "the most beautiful order of Ecclesiastical regiment;" "the substantial form of Christ's government;" "the most holy discipline, pure, perfect, and full of all goodness." These are all terms extracted from their own books; of which the reader may be left to form his own opinion. See much more of the same sort of language in Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift. Bishop Cooper, who condescended to answer Penry, observed, that indeed neither he nor the other Bishops could expect to escape the venom of their scoffs, since the saints of God in heaven did feel it; for whenever they spake of Peter, Paul, and the blessed Virgin, &c. whom others justly called saints, their phrase in derision was, Sir Peter, Sir Paul, Sir Mary, &c. and indeed this was very true. The Bishop himself received answers to his book, under the vulgar titles of "Work for a Cooper," "More Work for a Cooper;" which, on less grave occasions, or addressed to persons of their own stamp, might have the credit given it of some wit.

Christians as possible in its communion,* the other to establish the rigid notions of a single party, "a small flock," as they called themselves; for it should be understood, that everything in the establishment that savoured of Lutheranism, was quite as obnoxious to the Marprelates, as Popery itself.

But it is certainly very remarkable that amidst all this abuse of Bishops and Archbishops, and of the Queen herself,† great indulgences were actually shewn to the Puritans, and though they were continually crying out for more liberty, and complaining of being silenced for Non-conformity, when their famous platform was brought forward to receive the subscriptions of their party in the year 1586, it was subscribed by above five hundred Puritan clergymen, all beneficed in the Church, and licensed to preach; and among these, their principal leaders, Cartwright, Travers, Field, Cawdrey, &c. &c.

But, indeed, one of their own friends at Court has given the best explanation possible of the course of proceedings there; we allude to the very celebrated and admirable letter of Sir Francis Walsingham to M. Critoy, the French

* See the Preface to the Common Prayer Book.

† "The errors of princes," say they, "are not to be maintained, but sharply to be reproved, rebuked, and told to them, by those which will be esteemed God's ministers and servants. Our Princess, therefore, as she deserveth high commendation for that good work which the Lord our God has wrought by her, so ought she not to be flattered in following of her fantasies, but rather sharply to be reproved, for that she chooseth rather to thrust out of the ministry true and learned preaching than a piece of Popish pomp." In fact, according to the principles of the Platform, the Queen was as open to excommunication from Puritanical Protestants, as from the head of the Church of Rome; as was acknowledged by the Lord Keeper Puckering, in a paper supposed to be drawn up by him, and printed by Strype, Annals, vol. iv. No. xciv., and which deserves to be noticed, because upon these principles, Mary Queen of Scots, being under the censures of the Kirk of Scotland, could not in the eyes of the Knoxian or Presbyterian ministry there, exercise her magistracy. In fact, she seems to have stood excommunicated by her ecclesiastical subjects, as well as deposed, by her lay subjects; and the power of magistracy taken from her as an offending "Child of the Church." Had Elizabeth yielded to the demands of the Puritans, she would have stood in the same situation, as to her responsibility, to the Consistory and lay elders; for it was another of their principles asserted by their champion Cartwright, that they had power and authority to form an establishment without the magistrate (Defence of the Admonition, p. 51.); and that, "if every hair of their head was a life, it ought to be offered in defence of such a cause." Much more of this may be seen in the numerous papers printed by Strype, from books and manuscripts which, falling into his hands, were as carefully preserved for posterity, as they were honestly copied for immediate use; so that, in fact, the originals may still be seen "among the Collections," to use Strype's own words, "of that great and wise Counsellor of the Queen, Lord Burghley, Lord Treasurer, the Nestor of his age, as he was styled."

Secretary, to be seen in Burnet, and Collier, ii. 607.* The latter author notices the strange circumstance of their being most active in setting up their discipline, and scattering their pamphlets, when the Spanish Armada was sweeping the seas, and menacing the kingdom with a conquest; and he thinks their mutinous behaviour at such a crisis (as though they thought the Government had neither leisure nor courage to call them to an account), lost them the friendship both of Leicester and Walsingham.

As this was the last year of Leicester's life, we do not wish to speak worse of him than he deserves, on such an occasion as the present; but as he has generally been reputed to have taken the side of the Puritans, in hopes of sharing more largely the spoliations of Church property then going forward, under pretence of reducing the revenues and possessions which had been abused by the Popish clergy; it would seem probable, if indeed the Puritans, as Collier suspects, lost his friendship about this period, that he had discovered the tendency of their principles to be quite as adverse to Church spoliations, as those of any of the parties opposed to them; for most certain it is, that the Puritans had it in view, to get into their own hands not only all presentations to Church livings but all impropriations, as was plainly shewn by a member of the House of Commons, in the last Parliament; "Indeed," says he, "their meaning is, to draw from us, maugre our heads, our impropriations, and if the spoil of the Bishops and Cathedral Churches will not serve their turns, as certainly they cannot, their number being so great,† then do they set it down, that we are bound to surrender out of our hands our abbey lands and such other possessions as have at any time belonged to the Church. They call us Church robbers, devourers of holy things, cormorants, &c.; affirming that by the laws of God, things once consecrated to God for the service of his Church, belong unto him for ever;" referring to a book put forth by them, called "A Complaint of the Commonalty," &c. "What, say they, belongeth to God that is kept from him?

* "I find," says this great man, "her Majesty's proceeding to be grounded on two principles. The one, that consciences are not to be forced, but to be won and induced by force of truth. The other, that causes of conscience when they exceed their bounds, and grow to be matter of faction, lose their nature; and that sovereign princes ought distinctly to punish their practices and contempt, though coloured with the pretence of conscience and religion." But the whole ought to be read as it may be seen in the works referred to.

† The lay elders who were to form part of their Consistories, were if necessary, to receive pay from their parishes; so that, at all events, some increase of funds, for ecclesiastical purposes, under the Genevan system was to be looked for.

even that which appertaineth to his Church, to wit, presentations and impropriations."

It is well to mention this, because no reign has been subject to greater misrepresentations, as it appears to us, than the reign of Elizabeth, for want of a due understanding of the principles at work among the different parties.* The Puritans found friends at Court ready enough to assist them in pulling down the Bishops, and equalizing the ministry, as long as it tended to enrich themselves, and while the established clergy only seemed to be the sufferers and complainants; not foreseeing that while they put it out of the power of the Catholics to reclaim such revenues and possessions, as having belonged to the Church under the Papacy, the friends of the Genevan Platform, even under their system of a parity and equality of ministers, looked to such spoliations as a robbery of God, and therefore as fairly to be reclaimed by themselves as by the Papists, could they but get the Church into their own hands.

Even Lord Burghley, we must confess, seems not thoroughly to have weighed the consequences of giving encouragement to the party opposed to the Bishops, though we must at the same time allow him the credit of wishing to do justice to all parties, and to temper severities. We have shewn that some of the leading Puritans were greatly indulged, and the unoffending generally so; and there was no man to whom Cartwright, Sampson, Humphrey, Travers, and others, appear to have been so ready to appeal, as to Lord Burghley; even Leicester himself is said to have generally applied to the Queen in their behalf, through that Lord. Yet it is not less certain, that the Bishops resorted to him, with full as great a confidence, and that he as often interposed to redress their grievances, letters being still extant in great numbers acknowledging such good turns and obligations. And though we would not pretend to deny that he partook of some of the Church spoils, yet certainly to no such extent as others of his contemporaries would have done, with similar opportunities; nor is it at all clear, that he judged the title to such property good, or the possessions irreclaimable, since it is somewhere recorded of him, that he cautioned his son to have as little to do with such property as possible, though by purchase.

† It would be difficult indeed to say, what a contrariety of parties were claiming to be indulged with an admission of their own tenets and discipline; for while the Puritans and Presbyterians were furiously engaged against Popery and the Established Church, the Brownists and Independents were as bitter adversaries to the Presbyterians. See in Strype's Parker, under the year 1573, Lord Burghley's Speech on the course to be pursued by Government amidst such divisions, and contrariety of opinions.

We must, however, have done with this subject for the present, and close our account of this Annus Mirabilis,* or year of great and surprising deliverance to Church and State, with the notice of more private occurrences.

On the 10th of July, 1588, Lord Burghley lost his friend, Archbishop Sandys, with whom he had been long acquainted, and very much in correspondence latterly, on subjects of importance regarding the Northern parts of the kingdom, and on the attempts made to deprive him of his revenues, which he regarded as the Church's patrimony, and defended as inviolable, a circumstance mentioned in his epitaph; "Ecclesiæ patrimonium, velut rem Deo sacratum decuit, intactum defendit." This epitaph (which may be seen at length in Strype's Life of Whitgift, Appendix, No. xl.) states him to have been genere non humilis; and, indeed, his family has since become ennobled,† and long admitted into the Peerage of the Realm. The present Baroness Sandys [Dowager Marchioness of Downshire] being the lineal descendant of Sir Samuel Sandys of Ombersley in Worcestershire, third son of the Archbishop.‡

One passage in this Archbishop's Will ought not to be omitted: "Because I have lived an old man in the ministry of Christ, a faithful disposer of the mysteries of God, and to my power, an earnest labourer in the vineyard of the Lord, I testify before God and his angels, and men of this world, I rest resolute to yield up my spirit, in that doctrine which I have privately studied and publickly preached, and which is this day maintained in the Church of England; both taking the same to be the whole council of God's word, and bread of eternal life, the fountain of living water, the power of God unto salvation to all them that believe."§

* It seems to have been at the time of the Spanish Armament, that to obviate misconceptions and the ill effects of false reports, Lord Burghley first adopted the expedient of printing regular gazettes, under the name of the ENGLISH MERCURY; several of which are to be seen in the British Museum, being justly regarded as the origin of our newspapers. They were printed by authority at London, and by Barker, the Queen's printer—1588.

† One branch of the family (originally from St. Bees, in Cumberland) had been ennobled before; namely, Sir William Sandes, first Lord Sandes of the Vine, in the reign of Henry VIII. Anno 1523.

‡ For a further account of his Grace, see Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, b. iii. ch. xxi., and his Annals of the Reformation, vol. iii. b. ii. ch. xxvii. Fuller says of him, "It is hard to say, whether he was more eminent in his own virtues, or more happy in his flourishing posterity."

§ In referring to this Will, and to shew how cautiously we should receive the testimony of partisans, Mr. Neal, in his History of the Puritans, seems to claim Archbishop Sandys as a friend,

We have already hinted that this was also the last year of the life of that extraordinary man, Dudley, Earl of Leicester; whose name, probably, will never be suffered to perish, but whose character we must, in a great measure, leave to others, there being amongst historians no deficiency either of praise or blame; but particularly the latter. We need not dwell on the horrible crimes imputed to him; they are, we should suppose, almost universally known, and perhaps as generally credited; but as Camden, who probably was well acquainted with his person, thinks there was some exaggeration in such charges, we shall abide by his short and cautious manner of speaking of him:—"He was esteemed," says he, "a most accomplished Courtier, free and bountiful to soldiers and students, a cunning time-server and respecter of his own advantages; of a disposition ready and apt to please, crafty and subtle towards his adversaries, much given formerly to women, and in his latter days doating extremely upon marriage. But whilst he preferred power and greatness (which are subject to be envied) before solid virtue, his detracting emulators found large matter to speak reproachfully of him, and even when he was in his most flourishing condition spared not disgracefully to defame him by libels, not without mixture of some untruths. In a word, people talked openly in his commendation, but privately he was ill spoken of by the greater part." Of the Queen's attachment to him, we had rather also speak, for want of any certain knowledge of particulars, in the language of the times, and fancy it possible that they might be "haply" drawn into "a conjunction and affinity of minds, through a hidden conspiracy and consent of their stars, which the Greek Astrologers term Synastria."* Thus Camden wrote in the days of Elizabeth's successor, and if it could pass then for creditable history, we may surely be contented to adopt it as such two centuries afterwards, rather than ransack too curiously the scandalous chronicles of those or subsequent days. They had each of them something in their characters quite unfathomable, and we are glad to be excused the trouble though, in other respects, as a persecutor of the Non-Conformists of his own party, because in this Will, he did candidly acknowledge, that he thought our ecclesiastical polity might, in some points, be bettered; but he should scarcely, we think, have extracted this from his last Will, without just hinting to his readers, that in that Will there is also the following passage: "So do I utterly dislike even in my conscience, all such rude and indigested Platforms, as have been more lately and boldly, than either learnedly or wisely preferred, tending not to the reformation, but to the destruction of this Church of England."

* They were born in the same year, and (quære) on the same day of the year.

of greater inquisitiveness, than belongs by any necessity to the task before us;* at all events, delicacy would prevent our seeking to crush a reputed enemy of Lord Burghley. Of their rivalry in the Queen's Council and confidence, there can be no doubt.—They were persons, in all likelihood, of totally different characters, constantly moving in the same sphere, and subject to such hazardous collisions, as without the greatest prudence and discretion on the part of one at least of the two, might at any time have disturbed the whole constitution of things, and brought on the absolute ruin of their country. We cannot hesitate to say what we think; namely, that this prudence was found in Lord Burghley, in a very extraordinary degree. He suffered Lord Leicester to stand as high as he chose, on the ground of favouritism, while he kept his hold on the Queen as the best Counsellor and ablest Politician, well knowing that that sagacious Sovereign was always capable of making the same distinction between the two. In this way, and upon such a footing, as it were, of stifled compromise, for a long time, almost generally indeed, the Queen's Ministers abroad, her commanders, her agents everywhere, and even the contending parties in Church and State, were allowed to address themselves to both Lords, joint Prime Ministers (if such an expression may be used), equally entitled to receive such important reports, and make their answers as they severally chose. This will be seen in many of the printed and manuscript correspondences of those days; and so far from there being any appearance of a jarring in their counsels, it would often appear that they were closely united in the pursuit of the same objects, and the recommendation of the same measures, taking upon themselves exactly the same degree of responsibility; and yet we doubt not but that they often differed, without openly thwarting each other, because the Queen knew how to discriminate. She might always, perhaps, find Leicester the most agreeable, but Burghley the wisest Counsellor. Had Elizabeth been the silly, vain, passionate, and headstrong woman, she is often represented to be, Leicester would have soon got the better of Burghley, nor would she have been worthy to have had the latter for her Minister; but sh was not capable of so great a mistake. She constantly knew the value of such a Minister and Counsellor as Lord Burghley,

* "He" (Lord Leicester) "had often," says Strype, "the misfortune to lie under the Queen's displeasure, though he were so great a favourite. But he soon recovered her favour again. And thus he once told the Lord Burghley, in a letter, what he found by his own experience; 'God be thanked, her blasts be not the storms of other Princes, though they be very sharp sometimes to those she loveth best.'"—This he wrote in 1572.

to his great cost, for she would never release him; if ever any man (to use a vulgar expression) died in harness, it was Lord Burghley. But to return to the rivalry between him and Leicester, they had their jarrings occasionally, but we have not been able in any instance to discover any undue submission on the part of Burghley, while Leicester, who always wrote, as we have said before, like a gentleman and a man of feeling and principle, seemed greatly to deplore any breach between them,* and since it is now fallen in our way to record his death, we think we may almost venture to say, that the last letter Leicester ever wrote, was an apologetic letter to Lord Burghley. It was dated from Maidenhead, on his road from his house in Wanstead (Essex) towards Kenilworth, which he never lived to reach, dying on his way at Cornbury Park, in Oxfordshire† (now the seat of Lord Churchill), Sept. 4, 1588. This letter was to prefer some suit to the Queen, through Lord Burghley, for Sir Robert Jermyn; in which letter he took the opportunity of apologising to his Lordship for quitting the Court without taking leave of him, hoping soon, as he added, to see him again; but they never met afterwards. He appears to have died of cold and fever, but some odd discoveries are related to have happened, of what, in those days, was called a conjuration to shorten his life, and examinations took place before the Council to prove the fact; but the question remains, as to the real efficacy or power of such alleged conjurations?‡

We shall only add, that of whatever moral offences this great Nobleman might have been guilty (and there are none imputed to him which we can totally disprove, or even, we are sorry to say, discredit), his epitaph in the Church of Warwick, whither his remains were removed from Cornbury Park, and which appears on a monument erected to his memory by his widow, has in it the following strong expressions:—"Optimo et charissimo marito, mæstis-

* It is curious to consider how oddly people were thrown together in those days.—Cecil and Leicester were constantly regarded as rivals, if not enemies, yet one of Cecil's principal friends was Sir Henry Sidney, who married Leicester's sister, and even Leicester himself seems to have encouraged his favourite nephew, the brave and accomplished Sir Philip Sidney, to solicit a marriage with Cecil's daughter. Leicester, the noted favourite of Elizabeth, was the son of that Duke of Northumberland, who lost his life for seeking to deprive Elizabeth of her right to the throne; and to go farther back, Northumberland, who overthrew and brought to the scaffold the Protector Somerset, after the first fall and disgrace of the latter, married his son to Somerset's daughter, and then destroyed her father.

† Strype says he died at an Inn, but he is contradicted by the Author of his Life. London, 1727.

SIMA UXOR LETICIA FRANCISCI KNOLLES ORDINIS S. GEORGII EQUITIS AURATI, ET REGIÆ THESAURARII FILIA, AMORIS ET CONJUGALIS FIDEI ERGO POSUIT."—Unfortunately for the credit of all parties, this mæstissima uxor appears to have had a paramour ready to take the Earl's place, her own gentleman of the horse, Sir Christopher Blunt, whom she shortly afterwards married. She has even been suspected of hastening the Earl's death by poison. —See Lingard and Birch's Memoirs.

Loaded as he was with courtly and honourable appointments when he died, it is said, that after the Spanish expedition, letters-patent were actually drawn for creating him Lord Lieutenant, under the Queen, in the government of England and Ireland, but that Lord Burghley and Sir *Christopher Hatton prevented his obtaining them, by representing to the Queen the danger of intrusting too great a power in any one man's hands.

He had made a will at Middleburgh, in 1587, by which he bequeathed his estates, after the death of his brother, the Earl of Warwick, to his base son (as he called him), Robert Dudley! There is reason to think he was not illegitimate, being the son of Lady Douglas Sheffield, duly married to Leicester, but repudiated to make room for the Countess of Essex. He seems to have been hardly and unjustly used by the latter, which disgusted him so much, that he left the kingdom; and not complying with an order under the Privy Seal to return, his lands were seized, and fell into the hands of Prince, afterwards King, Charles. Sir Robert Dudley (for he had obtained the honour of Knighthood), is reported to have taken with him, on his leaving England, though already married, a daughter of Sir Robert Southwell's, in the habit of a page, and to have afterwards married her in Italy. He seated himself in the dominions of the Duke of Tuscany—contrived an expedient for draining the fens and marshes in the neighbourhood of Leghorn, and raised that poor town, which was then no other than a village for fishermen, to be one of the most famous sea-ports in all Italy; the reputation of his accomplishments spreading into Germany, the title of Duke was conferred on him and his heirs, by letters-patent, from the Emperor Ferdinand II.; whereupon he took the title of Duke of Northumberland, which had been borne by his grandfather, though forfeited by attainder, in the first year of

* On the death of Leicester, Sir Christopher Hatton succeeded him as Chancellor of the University of Oxford. Lords Shrewsbury and Derby made their condolences to the Queen, through Sir Christopher and Lord Burghley, to whom they wrote to that effect from Sheffield Lodge, two days only after Leicester died.

Queen Mary. He erected a beautiful palace in the city of Florence; and his daughters by the wife he took along with him, were all of them married to Princes of the Empire. The Lady also whom he left behind, upon application to King Charles I., obtained a grant, under the Great Seal of England, of the title of Duchess, for her natural life; and that her daughters should have place and precedence as children to a person of that quality.* This grant is grounded upon the injury Sir Robert and his family were held to have sustained by the disavowal of his legitimacy on the part of his father; the consequent transfer, sale, and forfeiture of his estates; and sufficient proofs of his legitimacy adduced by witnesses in the Star Chamber, including the testimony of "the Lady Douglas herself." This case, then, seems to be clear of any touch of slander and calumny; and, as a sort of after-piece to the history of this famous Earl, we have ventured to lay it before the reader.

The Lord Treasurer suffered a great affliction in the course of this memorable year, by the death of his truly beloved daughter ANNE, Countess of OXFORD, who died at the court at Greenwich, leaving three daughters, the only survivors of a numerous issue. She was, as has been before shewn, the wife of EDWARD VERE, seventeenth Earl of Oxford, of that name, Lord High Chamberlain of England; a husband in many respects unworthy of so amiable, correct, and attached a consort: but of this we have said enough in other parts of our history. If her venerable father could have derived consolation from the public notice taken of this great domestic trouble, he might have found it in the many tributary copies of verses sent to him on the occasion, in English, Latin, Greek,

* Life of Robert, Earl of Leicester, 276, 277. The patent itself is to be seen in the Appendix, No. xiii. She appears to have been called not Duchess of Northumberland, but Duchess Dudley; she died in 1669 at the advanced age of 90, and was buried at Stonely, in Warwickshire, the place of her family, she being the third daughter of Sir Thomas Leigh. A stately monument was erected there to her memory, and another in St. Giles's Church, London, the parish in which her house stood. An engraving of the latter, with the inscription, may be seen in Pennant's London. There is a curious story told of her husband in the Biographia Britannica, art. Cotton (Sir Robert), by which it appears that he was the actual author of a pamphlet written to ingratiate himself with King James the First, entitled, "A Proposition for his Majesty's service, to bridle the impertinence of Parliaments;" which book, having got into the hands of Sir Robert Cotton, he caused a copy to be taken, whereby he fell under the suspicion of being concerned in the writing or distribution of the work, had his famous library seized, and himself excluded from it; and though his innocence was afterwards established, the troubles he underwent brought him to his grave. The particulars of this extraordinary story were not thoroughly known till the year 1767.

Her Ladyship was buried in Westminster Abbey, of which we shall have more to say hereafter. Her death is thus noticed in Lord Burghley's Journal or Diary, in Murdin: "July, 1588, ANNA, Comitissa OXONIÆ, filia mea charissima obiit in Do: Grenwici, et 25 Sepult: Westminster."

THE Parliament, which had originally been summoned to meet for business on Tuesday, the 12th of November, 1588, being, for special reasons, afterwards adjourned to the 4th of February, 1588-9, was opened on the latter day accordingly, her Majesty being present; and Sir Christopher Hatton, late Vice Chamberlain, appearing as Lord Chancellor, in the room of Bromley, deceased, declared the purpose of the meeting to be, to "make preparation, as far forth as by the counsel of man was possible, to have an army prepared and furnished against all events. The King of Spain, by all accounts, notwithstanding his great losses, and the total discomfiture of his fleet in the summer preceding, continuing as much bent as ever against the peace of England;" and, indeed, he seems only to have changed the point of attack, according to Camden, whose account of his designs upon Scotland this year, and of James's escape from his snares, is extremely curious.

Having had occasion to speak of this Parliament before, it being, as usual with Strype, referred by him to the year 1588; and having given an account of the declaration of the Lords, drawn up by Lord Burghley, we have little more to say of it here, than that the Houses came to a resolution of granting to her Majesty "the unusual and extraordinary gift of four fifteenths and tenths, and two entire subsidies, the Clergy also adding two subsidies of their own," as it is represented in the Journal of Sir Simon D'Ewes. "They also desired her Majesty," before they separated, "to denounce open war against the King of Spain, who had so lately invaded her, whom they concluded to have been the root and fountain of all the conspiracies practised, and of all the rebellions raised against her Majesty."

As this extraordinary aid was granted for four years, it did not pass without many observations, of which an account may be seen in Strype, who has also printed an ingenious speech delivered on the occasion, objecting more to the mode than the amount of the assessment, and the hazard of the precedent. Great professions of loyalty are intermixed with very apt quotations from the classical and even the sacred historians. It may be found in the Appendix to the third volume of the Annals, No. lviii. For a further account of proceedings, both in the Parliament and Convocation, the Life of Archbishop Whitgift may be consulted. They were both dissolved in the month of March.

It was but a short time after this that Lord Burghley sustained a loss which he is judged never to have recovered, and it seems to be true; his desire being great, soon after, to lay down his offices, and retire from public life: and it was remarked, that it made a great alteration in his temper, and rendered him thoughtful and melancholy; though, otherwise, many things seemed to concur to render his life more comfortable, as the death of some whom he regarded as his adversaries, and the advancement of his son at Court, whose talents appeared to attract the notice of the Queen more and more daily. The loss we allude to, was that of his very highly accomplished lady, Mildred, Baroness Burghley, who died on the 4th of April, 1589, to her Lord's great sorrow, with whom she had lived in the sincerest harmony and affection three and forty years. It is well known that she was one of the five* learned daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke, Giddy Hall, whose attainments were as well known to, and as much admired by foreigners as by their own countrymen; but before we record the praises bestowed on Lady Burghley in particular, for her great learning, we must turn to consider her private virtues, as depictured by the faithful pen of her disconsolate Lord. The original is still preserved among the Burghley papers in the Lansdowne collection of MSS. No. ciii. 51, purporting to be "a Meditation on the Death of his Lady;" and, though of considerable length, too much appertaining to the present history, to be properly omitted, or even curtailed.

"There is no cogitation to be used with an intent to recover that which never can be had again; that is, to have my dear wife live again in her mortal body, which is separated from the soul, and resteth in the earth, dead; and the soul taken up to heaven, and there to remain in the fruition of blessedness unspeakable, until the general surrection of all flesh: when, by the almighty power of God (who made all things of nothing), her body shall be raised up and joined with her soul, in an everlasting unspeakable joy, such as no tongue can express, nor heart can conceive.

"Therefore my cogitations ought to be occupied in these things following: I. To thank Almighty God for his favour in permitting her to have lived so many years together with me; and to have given her grace to have had the true knowledge of her salvation, by the death of his Son Jesus, opened to her by the knowledge of the Gospel; whereof she was a professor from her youth. I ought to comfort myself with the remembrance of her many virtuous and godly actions, wherein she continued all her life: and specially, in that she did of late years sundry charitable deeds, whereof she determined to have no outward knowledge while she lived; insomuch, as when I had some little understanding thereof, and asked wherein she had disposed any charitable gifts (according to her often wishing that she were able to do some special act for maintenance of learning and relief of the poor), she would always only shew herself rather desirous so to do, than ever confess any such act, as since her death is manifestly known now to me; and confessed by sundry good men (whose names and ministry she secretly used), that she did charge them most strictly, that while she lived they should never declare the same to me nor to any other.

"And so now have I seen her earnest writings to that purpose of her own hand. The particulars of many of these hereafter do follow, which I do with mine own hand-writing recite for my comfort in the memory thereof; with assurance that God hath accepted the same in such favourable sort, as she findeth now the fruits thereof in heaven. About ——— years since she caused exhibitions to be secretly given, by the hands of the Master of St. John's in Cambridge, for the maintenance of two scholars; for a perpetuity whereof to continue, she did cause some lands to be purchased in the name of the Dean of Westminster, who also in his own name did assure the same to the College, for a perpetual maintenance of the two said scholars, all which was done without any signification of her act or charge to any manner of person, but only of the Dean, and of William Walter of Wymbleton, whose advice was used for the writing of the purchase and insurance.

" II. She also did, with the privity of Masters Deans of Paul's* and Westminster, and of Mr. Aldersey, being free of the Haberdashers in London, give to the Company of the said Haberdashers a good sum of money; whereby is provided, that every two years there is lent to six poor men of certain special occupations, as smiths, carpenters, weavers, and such like, in Rumford, in Essex, 20*l.* a piece, in all 120*l.*; and in Cheshunt and Waltham, to other six like persons, twenty marks a piece, in the whole 80*l.* which relief, by way of loan, is to continue.

" III. By the same means is provided for twenty poor people in Cheshunt, the first Sunday of every month, a mess of meat, in flesh, bread, and money for drink.

" IV. And likewise is provided four marks yearly, for four sermons, to be preached quarterly by one of the preachers of St. John's College. And these distributions have been made a long time (while she lived) by some of my servants, without giving me knowledge thereof. Though indeed, I had cause to think that she did sometimes bestow such kind of alms; but not that I know of any such order taken for continuance thereof, for she would commonly rather use speeches with me, how she was disposed to give all she could to some such uses, if she could devise to have the same faithfully performed after her life, whereof she always pretended many doubts.

" And for that she used the advice of M. M. Deans of Paul's and Westminster, and would have her actions kept secret; she forced upon them some fine pieces of plate to be used in their chambers as remembrances of her good will for their pains.

" She also did, four times in the year, secretly send to all the prisons in London money to buy bread, cheese, and drink, commonly for four hundred persons, and many times more, without knowledge from whom the same came.

* Dean Nowell preached her funeral sermon.

" She did likewise, sundry times in the year, send shirts and smocks to the poor people both in London and at Cheshunt.

" She gave also a sum of money to the Master of St. John's College, to procure and to have fires in the Hall of that College, upon all Sundays and Holidays, between the feasts of All Saints and Candlemas, when there were no ordinary fires at the charge of the College.

" She gave also a sum of money secretly towards a building, for a new way at Cambridge to the common schools.

" She also provided a great number of books, whereof she gave some to the University of Cambridge; namely, the great Bible in Hebrew, and four other tongues; and to the College of St. John's, very many books in Greek, of Divinity and physic, and of other sciences. The like she did to Christ Church and St. John's College in Oxford. The like she did to the College of Westminster.

" She did also yearly provide wool and flax, and did distribute it to poor women in Cheshunt parish, willing them to work the same into yarn; and to bring it to her to see their manner of working. And for the most part, she gave to them the stuff freely, by way of alms; for she caused the same to be wrought into cloth, and gave it to the poor, paying first for the spinning more than it was worth.

" Not long before her death, she caused secretly to be bought a quantity of wheat and rye, to be disposed among the poor in time of dearth, which remained unspent at her death; but the same confessed by such as provided it secretly; and therefore, in conscience, so to be distributed according to her mind.

" April 9, 1588.—Written at Colling's Lodge, by me in sorrow, W. B."

This is certainly a very curious and interesting document; it is impossible not to admire the anti-pharisaical modesty of this worthy woman in distributing her charity so secretly; and particularly her attention to St. John's College, where her Lord had his education. In the date above, there is certainly a mistake, though it appears in the Lansdown Catalogue unnoticed. It seems to to have misled Strype, who places Lady Burghley's death under the year 1588; but it undoubtedly took place in 1589.* Strype indeed himself has published a document, in which the mistake appears to be corrected by Lord Burghley himself. It is to be found in the fourth volume of his Annals, consisting entirely of original papers, No. cclii., being a large Latin inscription,* composed by Lord Burghley soon after the death of the Countess of Oxford, his daughter, and his own Lady; in which, after rehearsing the benefactions already mentioned, the following passage occurs:—

* See Biographia Britannica. The following is Lord Burghley's own entry of the event in his Diary;—1589, April 4. Die Veneris inter hor. 3 et 4, mane obdormit in Domino Mildreda Domina Burgley.

"Post ista autem multaque alia ejus generis præstita officia, et Deo et patriæ, mihique conjugi, ac liberis suis, doctisque et pauperibus, sponte in anno suo climacterico, viz. lxiii. spiritum reddidit Deo, quarto Aprilis, anno 1589. Cujus corpus ego maritus et pater adjungendum duxi corpori filiæ nostræ Annæ,† paulo ante sub isto lapide repositæ, ut conjunctæ reservarentur ad spem resurrectionis."

We must add something further of this extraordinary lady. "Her learning, as well as piety," says Strype, "appeared hence; that with the great Bible in Hebrew and other languages, which she presented to the University Library, she sent an epistle written in Greek, with her own hand, which I have seen. She used for her prayers and meditations, a small pocket-book in Latin, richly bound, intitled, Psalmi seu precationes Johannis Episcopi Roffensis; to which book of devotions she set her own name thus,—MILDREDA CECILIA, 1565."‡ Strype speaks also of a Dedication to the translation of the History of France, in which, after her death, she was highly extolled for her learning and piety: "That famous religious and learned lady, flower of her family, provident mother, blessed in her posterity, Mildred, Baroness of Burghley."—[Annals, iii. part ii., 130, where more to the same effect, but in no good style of writing, may be seen.]

Lastly, Chr. Ockland, as we have before observed, an eminent grammarian, made choice of her, in the year 1582, to be the patroness of a Latin poem, called ELIZABETHA; and addressed, Ad prænobilem et in primis eruditam

* The whole is well worth reading.

† Lady Oxford died June 1588, and was buried on the 25th, according to the following entry by Lord Burghley, already noticed:—"Anna Comitissa Oxoniæ filia mea charissima obiit in Dō. Grenwici, et 25 sepult. Westminster."

How much Lord Burghley was affected with his loss at the time,‡ besides what appears from the above meditations, may be seen in his letters to his friends, particularly one to Lord Shrewsbury preserved by Lodge, written about six weeks afterwards, in which, though in rather obscure terms, he intimates, that it was impossible for him to shake off the remembrance of his great loss, which still disturbed him night and day; he seems to have abandoned his mansion for a time, as this letter is dated, "From a poore lodge neare my howss at Theobald's, 27 Maij 1589," and in the P. S. he says, "the Queen is at Barn Elms (the

† It may be concluded that this noble lady makes a conspicuous figure in Lambard's Memoirs of the Learned Ladies of Great Britain, as well as her sisters, Lady Bacon, &c. The number of these ladies amount in all only to sixty-four, beginning (to take them alphabetically) with Mary Countess of Arundel, and ending with Anne, Countess of Winchilsea. Lambard gives Lady Burghley the credit of being a good politician, and cites a letter from her to Sir William Fitzwilliams, Deputy of Ireland, containing excellent advice. It is certain that Maitland of Lethington corresponded with her in the early part of Elizabeth's reign.

‡ "Lady Burghley," says Macdiarmid, "was adorned with every quality which could excite love and esteem, and many instances are recorded of her learning, piety, and beneficence. She had accompanied her husband through all the vicissitudes of his fortunes, and the tender attachment, which naturally became matured during a continued intercourse of three and forty years, rendered the loss of her the severest calamity of his life. The despondency which this irreparable calamity threw over his mind, produced a desire to renounce public business, so irksome in that state of his feelings, and to devote the remainder of his life to retirement and meditation. But Elizabeth was too sensible of the vast importance of his counsels to permit the execution of this purpose, peremptorily rejecting the resignation which he repeatedly tendered, yet softening her refusal with those arts which she knew so well to employ, she prevailed on him to retain a station for which she despaired of procuring a suitable successor." seat of Sir Francis Walsingham), but this night I will attend on hir at Westminster, for I am no man mete for feastings."*

It was while this great affliction pressed hard upon the Treasurer, that a very extraordinary expedition took place against Spain. It seems to have originated in an offer from Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake, to fit out a fleet chiefly at their own charges, to assail Philip on his own coasts; the Queen to lend ships, upon an understanding that the spoils and vessels that might be taken from the enemy should be divided amongst them.† The dethroned King of Portugal, Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, joined them with some Portuguese, upon a false hope, that with such help, a revolt from Philip in Portugal on his appearance there, and some help from the King of Morocco, he might recover his crown.

It was upon this occasion that the young Earl of Essex‡ began to display the uncontrollable nature of his disposition, and to render himself conspicuous as a soldier and a courtier; being unable to procure the Queen's leave to join the expedition in the way he wished, being ardently bent upon humbling the Spaniard, and commiserating besides the forlorn condition of the unfortunate Don Antonio, he embarked on board a vessel of the Queen's, on his own responsibility, taking with him many other young persons of family, in order to fall in with the fleet wherever he should find it, and in defiance of all prohibitions from the Court, to bear his part in the adventure; he met with the fleet, on its way from the Groyne in Gallicia, where the English forces had been landed, and after doing considerable mischief, and bravely resisting an attack of the Spanish army,§ sent to intercept their return to their ships, re-embarked to pursue their course to Portugal. It was at this time that Essex joined them, and had the opportunity been equal to his courage, he might perhaps have done

* This visit to Barn-Elms seems to have been entirely for purposes of relaxation from business, and festivity, as Lord Talbot, who accompanied her Majesty, as one of her suite, wrote to his father, Lord Shrewsbury, "This day her Majesty goeth to Barn-Elms, where she is purposed to tarry all day to-morrow, being Tuesday, and on Wednesday to return to Whitehall again. I am appointed among the rest to attend her Majesty. I pray God my diligent attendance then may procure me a gracious answer, in my suit at my return; for, whilst she is there, nothing may be moved but matter of delight or to content her, which is the only cause of her going thither."

great things for his friend Don Antonio; but never were the efforts of bravery more thrown away. On the approach to Lisbon, Albert of Austria, who commanded on the part of Philip, caused the Portuguese to be disarmed, so that had they been ever so disposed to revolt in favour of the deposed King, they were deprived of all power to help him, while the succour he expected from Muley Hamet, the King of Morocco, totally failed, nor was the army supported, as was expected, by Drake, who was to have entered the Tagus, and battered the walls of the city; but was prevented, as he alleged, by the extreme dangers he had to encounter, from the shelves and shallows, or the fire of the fort of St. Julian's, either of which might have been the ruin of his fleet. Sickness also attacked the soldiers and sailors, not fewer than six thousand* having, as it was said, fallen a sacrifice. The whole expedition, in short, may be regarded in its consequences as a mere bravado, calculated to give the Spaniards a proof and trial of the spirit of Englishmen, but of little use to the nation, and considerable loss to the projectors of it.†

As to the general state of politics this year, Lord Burghley, in his letters to Lord Shrewsbury, printed by Lodge, very well describes the extraordinary posture of affairs, that made England the sworn friend of a King of Scotland and a King of France, so contrary to former proceedings; but at the same time he admirably accounts for the change that might appear to have taken place.

"The world," writes his Lordship, June 16, 1589, "is become very strange! we Englishmen now daily desire the prosperity of a King of France, and of a King of Scots; we were wont to aid the subjects oppressed, against both these Kings, now we are moved to aid both these Kings against their rebelling subjects; and though these are contrary effects, yet on our part they proceed for one cause, for that we do is to weaken our enemies." And in another letter, adverting to the very same odd revolution, he writes, "Seeing both are enemies to our enemies, we have cause to join with them in their actions against our enemies;" in fact, as was the case from the very earliest period of Lord Burghley's political life, the ambition of the House of Guise was the cause even of this great change, and unlooked-for posture of affairs. Since the death of the Duke of Anjou, the Guises, who stood at the head of the Holy League, had been contemplating the want of issue on the part of the King, Henry III. and the Protestantism of the King of Navarre, as opening a good prospect to them, of bringing the Crown into their own family; but they seem to have overlooked the chance, of the King's uniting with the more regular heir to his crown, out of enmity to a family, of whose encroachments his predecessors on the throne had always been jealous. This junction indeed took place, but not until after the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal, his brother, had both fallen by assassination, and the kingdom been almost reduced to a state of anarchy. Then it was that Henry III. sought refuge among the Protestants; "It is a thing very remarkable," says Rapin, "that this Prince, who had sworn to extirpate the Hugonots, and solemnly declared he would never keep promise with them, scarce found any other subjects but the Hugonots, in whom he could confide."* But this step could not be forgiven by the Leaguers; exasperated no doubt, in a high degree, by the recent disgraceful assassination of the Duke and Cardinal; nor were fanatics wanting to execute the decrees of Rome. In resentment of the murder, not of the Duke but of the Cardinal, Sixtus V. had issued a Bull against Henry, couched in the most violent terms; and though these instruments might seem to some to have lost their force, Henry judged otherwise: "Il y en a, disoit-il, qui se jouent des foudres de Vatican; mais pour moi je les ai toujours craint, et je les redoute encore plus que tous les canons de la Ligue." Nor were his apprehensions vain. With the assistance of his new friends, the King of Navarre, and his Protestant army, Henry was upon the eve of compelling the Parisians to return to their duty, when he was stabbed in the belly by Clement, a Jacobin Monk, and died of the wound in two days after, having previously nominated Henry of Navarre (as head of the House of Bourbon) to be his successor.† The League, indeed, did not regard the latter as head of the

* It is related, as a remarkable instance of the good-natured confidence of Henry IV., that he no sooner heard of Henry III.'s determination to join him, than, without waiting for his army to come up, he went to him, attended only by a single page.

† He died on the second of August, 1589, aged thirty-nine, after having reigned fifteen years. In him terminated the race of Valois, which had had possession of the throne 261 years, and given thirteen monarchs to France. Henry latterly disgraced himself sadly by the strange life he led, and the favourites he countenanced. He was the Founder of the Order of the St. Esprit, commemorative of his becoming both King of Poland and King of France on the day of Pentecost. He is said to have complained to a friend, that his rest was often disturbed at nights, by reflecting house of Bourbon, while his uncle, the Cardinal of Bourbon, was living; and therefore, though the latter was in prison, and there were some who would have given the crown to the Guises, the Cardinal was proclaimed King by that party, as Charles the Xth.—but in vain. Elizabeth stood forth at this trying moment, to support the claims of Henry, and, by a quick supply of men and money, enabled him to bear up against the Duke of Mayenne, and to continue the contest; for the issue of which, however, we must be content to wait some time longer, since it was not till the year 1593, that this great man may be said to have fairly seated himself on the throne of France; and then, not without a sacrifice, that in no small degree tarnished his glory.

We shall conclude our account of this year with a short obituary; as the friends and fellow-servants of Lord Burghley began now rapidly to decline.

Among the friends he lost this year, we may notice Frances, Countess of Sussex,* the relict of the great man who had the honour of being reputed the head of a party opposed to Leicester; the discordancy of their principles cannot but redound to the credit of Sussex; he was an honest man in a corrupt Court, and too brave to put up with indignities. Lord Burghley appears to have enjoyed his confidence and friendship to the last. Lady Sussex was moreover the sister of Lord Burghley's great friend Sir Henry Sidney; but we need not dwell longer on the celebrity of her family or friendly connexions, since her name, it is to be hoped, will live for ever, as the munificent foundress of Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge; her will to which effect may be seen in Strype, Annals iii. part ii. 115.

Among the fellow-servants of Lord Burghley (so to speak), Sir Walter Mildmay, Chancellor of the Exchequer, deserves particularly to be mentioned. He also died this year, being, according to Camden, who probably knew him well, "a man of remarkable piety and singular wisdom, and who discharged all the offices of a good citizen and a good man." Lloyd calls him "that upright and advised man." He seems to have began life with Lord Burghley, being made Surveyor of the Court of Augmentation by Henry VIII., knighted by Edward VI., and made Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer by Elizabeth. During Mary's reign, "he," as Lloyd says, "practised the politick on the massacre of St. Bartholomew; if so, it may be hoped that he lived long enough to repent of his share in that horrible transaction.

* As she died on the 8th of March, 1588-9, Strype mentions her death under the former year, as he does also the death of Lady Burghley and others.

precept, 'bene vixit, qui bene latuit;' by taking himself out of the way." He also became a great benefactor to the University of Cambridge, being the founder of Emanuel College there, in the year 1584.

The death of Dr. Laurence Humphrey, President of Magdalen College, Oxford, ought perhaps also to be noticed, as of a person who, on the score of Non-conformity, gave Lord Burghley no small trouble, in the early part of the Queen's reign, but who stopped short of any violent extremities, and distinguished himself greatly by his learned works, and the lectures he read in the University, as Professor of Divinity.*

In the course of this year the King of Scotland married a daughter of the King of Denmark; and, with a considerable degree of gallantry, when the Fleet in which she had embarked to repair to Scotland, was driven back by a tempest, crossed the seas to Norway, to consummate his marriage, where he stayed from October to the May following. On his return, Elizabeth sent the Earl of Worcester to offer him her congratulations.†

We have a curious account of the Queen's good health this year, in the following postscript of a letter from Mr. Stanhope to Lord Talbot, from Richmond.‡ "My Lord, the Queen is so well as I assure you vi or vii gallyards § in a morning, besides music and singing, is her ordinary exercise." Her Majesty was at this time fifty-six years old.

We must not, out of any delicacy to Lord Burghley, begin this year, 1590, without giving to Elizabeth the credit other historians have given her for the wise and frugal management of her revenue, her honourable attention to the loans advanced for public services, and her great anxiety not to burthen her subjects with more taxes than were absolutely necessary. But there is coupled with this a story relative to the customs, which the enemies of Lord Burghley are always careful to dwell upon, though it seems to us to convey a reproach to which he was of all persons the least likely to render himself liable; nor do we find it so correctly told as to remove all doubts from our own minds as to the exact circumstances of the case. We had rather however notice it, than be judged anxious to suppress it, to the deception of the reader.

* Lord Compton also died this year, which we mention only to correct a strange mistake in Collins's Peerage, where it is stated, that, in the forty-fourth of Elizabeth, he was one of those who besieged the Earl of Essex in his house. The forty-fourth of Elizabeth was 1602. Lord Burghley, who died in 1598, was an overseer of his will, which bore date the year he died.

† The Order of the Garter was also conferred upon him.

At the commencement of this year, the fear of the Spaniards, and the necessity of supporting her foreign allies, led the Queen into great expenses. She increased her fleets, fortified many places on the sea coasts, and was very liberal of supplies to the King of France; insomuch that though in 1587, whilst he was yet only King of Navarre, she had advanced him 101,560 French crowns to raise an army in Germany, and in 1589, 71,165 more, and expended 20,000 in sending over auxiliary forces under the Lord Willoughby, yet this year she advanced, upon the security of the Viscount Turenne, a further sum of 33,333 crowns, for another German army; not neglecting, in the mean while, her own army in Flanders, nor the towns there under her protection; and in the midst of all these extraordinary charges, and contrary to all expectations, repaying large sums, borrowed in times past of her subjects.

"But the truth is," says Camden, "she was providently frugal, and scarcely spent anything but for the maintenance of her royal state, the defence of her kingdom, or the relieving of her neighbours. And Burghley, Lord Treasurer, looked narrowly unto those who had the charge of customs and imports, by whose avarice many things were underhand embezzled, and through whose negligence the just dues were not exacted."

And then follows the story to which we have alluded, reflecting on Lord Burghley, Leicester, and Walsingham; for having, upon a time, done all they could to stifle the informations of a man who had discovered great peculations in the customs, and endeavouring to turn the Queen aside from any inquiries into that branch of the revenue; the fact chiefly insisted upon being, that Sir Thomas Smith had been allowed to farm the customs for 14,000*l.* per annum, when the Queen, in consequence of the discoveries made, in defiance of the remonstrances of her courtiers, had been since able to raise them first to 42,000*l.* per ann., and afterwards to 50,000*l.*

That the Queen had many greedy and covetous courtiers around her, we cannot for a moment doubt; nor can we pretend to dispute the above fact, as to the principal circumstances of it; but in the case above, there is an odd association of persons, and possibly therefore they may have been actuated by different motives. Sir Thomas seems, even by Camden's account, to have bought or hired the customs for a term of years, perhaps for his life; things at that time were only in the way to be improved as opportunities occurred; grants from the crown, and monopolies, were among some of the most crying abuses of those days; but when changes and improvements of such a nature are contemplated even in our own times, and in cases of the most glaring abuse, regard is generally had to vested interests, and unexpired grants.* We cannot pretend to answer for any private interest Leicester might have had in stifling such information, but we must claim for Lord Burghley the credit of rather listening to such information, when well timed and respectably brought forward, and of correcting all abuses affecting the revenue, than of wilfully conniving at them; and as for Walsingham, so far from plundering the public to any such degree, as other courtiers were known to do, it is pretty generally allowed that he impoverished himself to serve his country and his Queen. We conceive, therefore, that there are some circumstances in this case not sufficiently known, and that, at all events, as far as Lord Burghley was concerned, he had other motives for interfering than such as were selfish, mercenary, or dishonest, as his enemies would insinuate. The Queen, however, has the credit given her, of having checked their proceedings by the following noble reply:—"That it was the duty of a Prince to hold an equal hand over the highest and the lowest; that such as accuse Magistrates and Counsellors rashly, without being able to prove it, are to be punished; those which accuse them justly, are to be heard; that she was Queen of the meanest subjects, as well as the greatest; neither would she stop her ears against them, nor endure that the Farmers of the Customs should, like horse-leeches, suck themselves fast upon the goods of the Commonwealth, whilst the poor Treasury waxed lean and was exhausted; nor that the Treasury should be crammed with the spoils and pollings of the poorer sort."†

* The story is told under the year 1590, but the information proffered the Queen, was evidently in the way of charge against Sir Thomas Smith while living, and he died in the year 1577. If the customs were fairly worth no more than 14,000*l.* per ann. when Sir Thomas Smith bought or hired them, the improvement must have been connected with the rapid advancement of the trade and commerce of the nation, the advantages of which must have enriched other persons, even if the Treasury did not immediately feel the effects.

† Elizabeth was very fond of making such speeches, when she seemed driven to it. Thus, when the Parliament interposed upon the subject of Monopolies, which she had granted in profusion to her courtiers, she sent for the Speaker, and sought to clear herself of all blame by a speech, in which she asserted that she "had never put her pen to any grant, but that upon pretext and semblance made to her, that it was both good and beneficial to the subjects in general, though

Whether the speech were made to suit the story, or the story the speech, we shall not presume to say, imperfectly acquainted as we are with the real merits of the case. We find nothing of it in the Life of Sir Thomas Smith, and must therefore leave it to take its chance, as an imputation upon the great man whose history we are writing, not sufficient to discredit what had just before been said of him by the historian, namely, that "Burghley, Lord Treasurer," in concurrence with the Queen's frugality, detestation of extortions, and care of the public, "looked narrowly unto those who had the charge of customs and imports," to prevent embezzlement, and negligence in exacting all just dues; to which we may reasonably add the following passage from his Life, by a Domestic. After speaking of the envy, slander, spite, and detraction (the companions of prosperity, as he calls them) to which his Lordship was exposed, he assigns the following as some of the causes thereof:—"For when courtiers, great men, and many of the Queen's servants and others, had suits to her Majesty (which she ever referred to his consideration), he often finding them neither reasonable nor lawful, would ever wish them to make 'honest and lawful suits,' and then he would do his best to further them, as he did many; but otherwise he would plainly tell them, 'the Queen might do what she pleased, but he would never recommend their suit;' as some would sue for monopolies; some for concealments; some for innovations against law; all which he protested against, terming them, 'Cankers of the Commonwealth.' Others to take leases, and turn out the Queen's ancient tenants; which when he misliked or rejected, and that they had not even what they listed, then they railed on him, though he had done them never so many pleasures before. Here was what bred him some enemies, for other cause gave he none; neither had he hardly any other enemies; his Lordship shunning enmity with all men, and hating to be accounted any man's adversary."—See also Macdiarmid's Lives of British Statesmen, on Lord Burghley's management of the Revenue, p. 174. 176.

Of the applications, or rather appeals, made this year to Lord Burghley, from persons and places of all descriptions, the reader may be satisfied by consulting the Papers in Strype's fourth volume of his Annals; and of which a private profit to some of her ancient servants who had deserved well." This was very long after Sir Thomas Smith's case, and after Lord Burghley's death; even in the year 1601; and yet the people were suffering more than ever under monopolies, or improvident grants; and if not from Farmers of the Revenue, from Patentees of the Crown. See D'Ewes's account of the proceedings in the House of Commons, and particularly Sir Robert Cecil's excellent, and rather humourous, speech upon the occasion, p. 652.

the titles only may be sufficient to shew the variety of cases constantly pressing upon him. Thus we find the Bishop of Winchester writing to him, about a dispute in Corpus-Christus College, Oxford; the Bishop of Man against an exorbitant rate; the Bishop of Durham about Sherborn Hospital; the Bishop of Hereford about an utterer of seditious words; the Senate and town of Geneva, "labouring under war and famine," through their agent Le Lect; the famous Thomas Cartwright upon the bad estate of his Hospital at Warwick; Sir John Smyth about the suppression of his book on Military discipline; and Topcliffe* upon Popish Seminaries.

But he had no small trouble given him at Court this year, by the over forward zeal of Sir Francis Knollys, the Queen's relative, and a busy striver in behalf of the Puritans. He had imbibed the notion that the English Episcopacy was not only unscriptural in its foundation, but in its principles and operation; not only injurious to the Queen's supremacy, but almost treasonably so. It ill became a person of Sir Francis's belief to advance such an argument, because, nothing could well be more adverse to the Queen's supremacy, than the Platform discipline; wherein, as (one wrote at the time) "The Majesty of the Prince was utterly excluded from all sway in the Presbytery;" [Life of Whitgift, ii. p. 41.] and the Queen herself [ib. i. p. 73.] seems to have told him as much. Sir Francis seems to have taken up the argument in hopes of bringing the Queen over to his sentiments, but she soon silenced him. It was to Lord Burghley, however, that he sought principally to refer the question, for

* We have had occasion to speak of this gentleman before; his name perhaps will never be forgotten. But there are some pieces of information conveyed to the Lord Treasurer, in the letter referred to, that are very curious, and probably true, though not expressed perhaps with that decorum to the sex, that we might wish to see preserved. He plainly tells the Lord Treasurer, that the greatest mischiefs were to be apprehended from the Priests' influence with ladies of rank, wealth, &c.—"There be also ladies, gentlewomen," he says, "as well married, as widows, needful to be shut up in effect, as much as men. And though they cannot go to the field and lie in camps (for the sex and shame), yet they want no desire nor malice, every one being furnished with a lusty priest, harboured in her closet, who shall serve as her lieutenant when that holy day of Jesus cometh; or else, she is prepared of a lusty Catholic champion, servant, tenant, or neighbour, or son for her purpose; command her purse, horse, armour, and tenant. And whether she be wife, widow, maid, or whatsoever, harbours, receives, and relieves priests and traitors, fugitives, or else ready to assist foreign invasion. And seeing far greater is the fury of a woman once resolved to evil, than the rage of a man, I humbly beseech your Lordship that that sex of woman be not overlooked; for of these patronesses of Priests, it is incredible how great a number there lurketh in and about London."

the Queen's satisfaction, as well as in his communications upon the subject with the Archbishop, Annals, iv. No. iv. v. Sir Francis was answerd by Mr. Anthony Marten, "a man of good learning," says Strype, "and of peaceable principles." See Life of Whitgift, book iv. ch. iii.; and as to Lord Burghley's own opinion of the incompatibility of the Queen's Supremacy, and the deposing powers of the Presbyteries or Consistories of the Puritans, see ib. ch. iv. pp. 58—60.

Amongst these letters is one from Lord Burghley, to Count Figgleazzi at Florence, upon the offer of the Duke of Florence to be the mediator of a peace between England and Spain, in which the aggressions and perpetual enmity of Philip are well set forth, in contradiction of the lying slanders, whereby her Majesty's actions had been depraved and condemned. The spirit with which the Queen received proposals of mediation as regarded Philip, may be judged of from the following passage in Lord Burghley's letter: "And as for the matter of mine, to reduce her Majesty and the King of Spain to accord and to live in peace, her Majesty knowing how inculpable she is, either for any beginning or for continuing these troubles, she cannot devise how to reform her course; but as the King of Spain hath or shall shew himself, either contented to live in peace, or to make proof of his great power by using that hostility against her Majesty, her people and countries, so she must and will be answerable to the one course or the other; that is, most willingly to live in peace with the King, if he so will yield thereto; and if not, then she findeth the favour of God to be ready for maintenance of her rights, with such powers as God hath given her; as she will never yield to his threatenings, nor, by God's grace, will be unready to defend herself and her dominions against the King of Spain, how mighty or strong soever he shall be by sea or land."

In France this year things seemed to proceed badly for Henry of Navarre, now undoubted King of France, could the leaguers and the King of Spain have been at all quieted; the Duke of Parma entered France, threw succours into Paris, and then retired; while the Spaniards made many attacks on the coast of Brittany, which engaged the attention of Elizabeth, who wished to have no such near neighbours; justly looking upon the conquest of France by Spain, as a sure step to the conquest of England.

Many have concluded that the Queen's situation was now comparatively tranquil and secure. The Queen of Scots, her great rival, was no longer in the world; and the King, her son, looking to the inheritance of England after Elizabeth, stifled all resentments The King of Spain was greatly disabled, by the loss of his invincible fleet; Maurice, Prince of Orange, was putting things upon a firm footing in Flanders; and the Duke of Guise, the great enemy of England, was dead. All these things tended to keep the English Catholics quiet. The late expedition to Spain and Portugal had the effect, at least, of proving to the Queen's enemies, that she was not without brave and competent defenders; but defenders were certainly still wanting, both in the field and in the cabinet (if we may so speak).

Many eminent persons died this year: that extraordinary Pontiff, Sixtus Quintus; the Earl of Warwick, the elder brother of Leicester;* Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary of State; Thomas Randolph, so renowned for his negotiations in Scotland; Sir James Croft; and George Earl of Shrewsbury, in whose custody the unhappy Queen of Scots passed so many years of her life. Walsingham died poor, and was buried very privately at St. Paul's. As a faithful, diligent, and attentive Minister to the Queen, he deserves great credit; he has been censured for his too great employment of spies, but they seem to have been quite necessary in that age of general dissimulation and intrigue; the same excuses we make for Walsingham, might perhaps apply to Randolph, who passed for a disturber in Scotland, but was undoubtedly a most able servant to the Queen. The author of the Court of Elizabeth, asks the following question with a degree of feeling, for which she certainly deserves every credit: "Looking even to the immediate results of his [Walsingham's] measures, it may triumphantly be demanded by the Philanthropist and the Sage, whether a system less artificial, less treacherous, and less cruel, would not equally well have succeeded in protecting the person of the Queen from the machinations of traitors, with the further and inestimable advantage of preserving her Government from reproach, and the national character from degradation?"

It is very obvious that this is a question that can never be answered; we have repeatedly called the reader's attention to the consideration, that dangers averted come, in time, to be called no dangers, and counterplots to be confounded with plots original, if we may so express ourselves. God forbid that we should be suspected of harbouring any wish to screen from the resentment of modern times, the crooked policy of the sixteenth century; but we cannot help feeling a jealousy of more blame being thrown on England, for her share in the intrigues of that AGE of DECEIT and DISSIMULATION, speaking of Europe generally, than she deserves. Heartily wishing that Elizabeth's wise counsellors could have "protected her person from the machinations of traitors," in a less artificial, treacherous, and cruel manner than was oftentimes the case, we must still confess, that the acquaintance we have formed in the course of our researches, with the base intrigues and murderous purposes of other Courts at the time, has often brought to our recollection a story, almost below the dignity of history to be introduced here, but yet too significant to be altogether omitted: —A centinel on duty being attacked by a ferocious dog, presented his piece and shot him dead; the owner of the dog remonstrated against the suddenness and cruelty of the action, demanding of the endangered soldier, why he had not rather defended himself by milder measures, and struck at the dog with only the but end of his gun: "And so I would have done," replied the soldier, "you may depend upon it, had he but run at me with his tail."

To return to the author of the Court of Elizabeth, speaking of Walsingham's measures, she says, "Unlike that pure and noble patriot, who 'would have lost his life with pleasure to serve his country, but would not have done a base thing to save it,' this Statesman seems to have held that few base things ought to be scrupled, by which his Queen and country might be served." And yet another author observes of this very Statesman, "He has been thought worthy, in several respects, to be compared to that Aristides, whose blameless manners, innocent life, and uncorrupted integrity, secured to him from his fellow-citizens the appellation of JUST."—Zouch's Life of Sir Philip Sidney, 210.

The following passage in the inscription on Walsingham's tomb, may deserve to be transcribed; after speaking of his several embassies, &c., it proceeds, "Quibus in muneribus tanta cum prudentiâ, abstinentiâ, munificentiâ, moderatione, pietate, industriâ, et solicitudine versatus est, ut a multis periculis, patriam liberârit, servârit rempublicam, confirmârit Pacem, juvare cunctos studuerit, imprimis quos Doctrina aut bellica virtus commendârit, seipsum denique neglexerit, quo prodesset aliis, eosque Valetudinis et Facultatum suasum dispendio sublevaret."

Sir Francis left one daughter, married first to Sir Philip Sidney, afterwards to the Earl of Essex.

The Lord Treasurer has not escaped censure, for allowing so eminent a public servant to die poor; but to read his epitaph, we may conclude that his own great liberality, charity, and zeal for his country, would for ever have prevented his becoming rich. Mr. Pennant, in his History of London, speaks of his having bought by accident a book of legends, containing an ancient MS. list of Statesmen in the reign of Elizabeth, consigned by the writer to the pains of hell, for their zeal against Catholics. Among these, Walsingham is represented as all in fire and flames; "And no wonder," says Mr. Pennant, "since he could contrive to get the Pope's pocket picked, when his Holiness was asleep, of the keys of a cabinet, by which he made himself master of an original letter of the first importance, which proved the saving of our island from the machinations of its bitterest enemies." Sir Francis has had the honour of being celebrated by Spenser as the Mecænas of the age. We have felt called upon to say rather more of Sir Francis Walsingham, because it has been usual to call him a "creature of Lord Burghley's;" which expression we shall therefore wish to explain, in the following words of the author of the British Statesmen: "It was Burghley who discovered, and brought into office, Sir Francis Walsingham, so much distinguished among the ministers of Elizabeth, for fidelity to the interests of his Sovereign, for uncorrupted integrity, for acuteness of penetration, soundness of judgment, extensive knowledge of public affairs, and profound acquaintance with human nature."

While all these persons were dropping around him, and though he suffered greatly from occasional returns of gout; in a letter from Kery, Clerk of the Privy Seal, to Lord Talbot, [Lodge, iii. 12.] October 22, 1590, the following account is to be found, of Lord Burghley's own apparent health: "I never knew my Lord Treasurer more lusty or fresh in hue, than at this hour." He had then entered into the 71st year of his age.

We have already observed, that the death of Lady Burghley is judged to have had a great effect on the Lord Treasurer; that public business became more burthensome to him, and his private life not so happy; though, indeed, the great talents and turn for business displayed by his second son, Sir Robert Cecil, were otherwise calculated to cheer his latter days. But, it must be confessed, a new trouble awaited him; for now began the opposition of the Essex party, which continued to the end of his life, exposing the aged Statesman to a competition exceedingly mortifying, from the great popularity of his young and principal competitor, and the near relationship of some who adhered to him. Lord Burghley was now 71 years of age, and Lord Essex about 24; the latter full of vivacity, liberal, accomplished, brave, and enterprising; a favourite with the Queen,* who being lately released from many embarrassments by the aid of her old Ministers, might seem to the ardent mind of Essex to stand less in need of that wary and cautious mode of proceeding, which had hitherto distinguished her reign, and brought the nation, through many otherwise insurmountable difficulties, to a state of comparative security; a security, however, not likely to last, except through continuance of the same vigilance, and the same prudent line of conduct. Essex was not made for quiet times, nor inclined to make such allowances for age, superior wisdom, riper judgment, and longer experience, as should have been the case. With every disposition to admire many brilliant traits in the character of this young Nobleman, we cannot forgive some of his sneers at the more prudent conduct of the Cecils,* for we must now speak of the Cecils in the plural number.

* He had served under his father-in-law, Leicester, in Flanders, 1585, and been made General of the horse, in the memorable year 1588, receiving particular marks of favour from the Queen, in sight of her soldiers and people at Tilbury, and being made Knight of the Garter.—See Birch, i. 74.

On the death of Walsingham, Essex, with great generosity, sought to get his friend Davison restored to favour, and to the post of Secretary; Lord Burghley very naturally wished the Secretaryship to be bestowed on his son, Sir Robert,† who, without any disparagement to Davison, had proved himself to be exceedingly fit for the situation, and we may add, surely, almost necessary to his father in his declining years, the Queen refusing to release the latter from his public and burthensome charges, however earnestly he solicited it.‡ These things

* Lord Essex had, by his dying father, been particularly recommended to the care of Lord Burghley, and, as Mr. Ellis observes, in his valuable publication of Original Letters, the latter "became a kind and honest guardian." Mr. Ellis has printed some curious papers relating to this young Lord's expenses, &c. at College, which may be seen in the third volume of the second series, Nos. ccviii. ccix., with several letters from the Earl to his guardian, Lord Burghley, in English and Latin, doing credit to both.

† He was knighted this year at Theobalds, and made a Privy Counsellor; he appears at this time to have been Sheriff for the county, as his father was Lord Lieutenant.—See Birch's Memoirs, 57. and Lodge, ii. 419. He sat in Parliament also for Hertfordshire, in the 34th and 39th of Elizabeth.—Biog. Brit. art. Robert Cecil. Having referred to this amusing work, we cannot help noticing a great mistake there, in regard to Sir Robert, who is represented to have been joint Secretary with Walsingham.

‡ There can be very little doubt that Lord Burghley did, at this time, eagerly wish to be delivered from the weight of his public offices, since it drew from the Queen a piece of rallying and satirical merriment, in hopes of diverting him from his purposes, to which she would scarcely have condescended, had she not been literally afraid that he was in earnest, and that she might lose his services, if he were not in some degree indulged. We cannot bring ourselves to copy the paper, for it has a good deal of absurdity, and very little true wit in it, and may be seen in the fourth volume of Strype's Annals, No. liv. as well as in the account of Lord Burghley in the Biographia Britannica, and other places, particularly Nichols's Progresses, vol. iii., where is a full account of his visit. It is addressed to "the disconsolate and retired spryte, the heremite of considered, there seems to be no great reason for imputing Davison's disappointments to bad motives on the part of Lord Burghley; he acted as most men would have done in his situation; he sought to have the assistance of his own son, and, to use an expression of an able writer, to "lean on a staff from his own wood," in a department where all foreign business was to be transacted, and without some control over which, as in times past, he could no longer expect to continue the same line of politics, to the preservation of the Queen and kingdom, and the advancement of the latter in wealth and glory.* Davison's

N. B. In this extraordinary paper it may deserve to be noticed, that the name is written Sir William Sitsilt, Knt.—See our first vol. ch. i. It would have saved the Queen and her Court much discredit, if many of the compliments paid to her, at these visiting times, had been allowed to perish. Upon occasion of this visit to Theobalds, it has been observed, that Sir Robert Cecil, then a young man, was a much greater flatterer than his father, the great Lord Burghley; but it was the vice of the times—Bacon was a great flatterer. If Sir Robert really prepared or superintended the devices, especially on her visit in 1593, there was in them certainly some gross flattery; we do not find that Lord Burghley ever amused himself with such things; he must, indeed, in the Progresses, have been a patient hearer of many grossly adulatory addresses, but he composed none himself, as far as we know.

* Excusing himself to Mr. Grimestone, at the beginning of this year, for not having punctually answered his letters, Lord Burghley says of himself, "but the cause is partly that I have no leisure, being, as it were, roundly besieged with affairs to be answered from north, south, east, and west, whereof I hope to be shortly delivered by supply of some to take charge, as her Majesty's principal Secretaries." Sir Robert was not regularly appointed Secretary till 1596; he must have been only so much the more necessary to his father as an assistant; and to shew how much the Queen considered him in that light, and Lord Burghley himself as the real Secretary, till the year 1596, we find him admitted to state secrets of importance in that character only, as appears from the following casual expression in a letter from Lord Burghley, while on a progress with the Queen, addressed to the Lord Keeper, Lord Buckhurst, &c. on the 30th of August, 1592. "Her Majesty would not any here of her Council know that part of his (Yonge's) confession, but only myself and Robert Cecil, because, seeing the length [of the confession, transmitted by them to the Queen], to ease me, she caused him to read it."

To the very last, however, though reduced very low, and scarce able to write, he preserved so much spirit as to oppose whatever counsels he thought either weak or worse.—See Memoirs of Sir William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, &c. p. 79.

return to that particular post, however deserving, would have thrown things much into the power of his rival, or his son's rival, Lord Essex, whose ardent spirit looked to no glory but in military and hazardous enterprises, and who, in the eyes of Lord Burghley, no doubt, seemed likely to hurry the nation into rash and imprudent measures.

To the credit of Elizabeth, she still knew how to value the services of her great Minister, and probably had discernment enough to discover, that the younger Cecil was, in fact, much more competent to fill the situation vacated by the death of Walsingham, than Davison,* but especially while he might have the benefit of his father's counsel and co-operation. And truly, we think any other determination would have amounted to an act of folly on the part of Elizabeth; the wisdom and care of the Cecils became every hour more important to her, after the loss of such a minister as Walsingham;† and though we would give Essex every credit for the sincerity of his friendship towards Davison, and for the feeling he had for his hard fate, yet, as a question of national importance, we think the Queen's wisdom was never more manifested than in the support she gave at this time to the Cecils, though it involved Lord Burghley, probably, in scenes very mortifying and distressing to his old age, worn with

* "And probably some distrust of the capacity of Davison, for so difficult and important a post."—Aikin's Court of Elizabeth.

† It was in the course of this year, that Standen, a confident of Sir Francis Walsingham, wrote as follows to the Lord Treasurer from Bourdeaux. "Before I end this, for the discharge of my duty to God, and the acquittal thereof to my Queen and country, I must crave pardon of your Honour, if I say, that in this my long peregrination and change of soils, I have had access to many, and to most of the Potentates that rule Europe, whose curiosity hath been such, as I have by them been sifted about the state of England, and her Majesty's royal person and admirable parts; also concerning her Council and Governors of that realm, namely, touching your Honour in particular, whose actions above all the other are most eyed; your Honour is the personage who, among these Princes and great ones abroad, is firmly believed only to hold the helm in such sort, that wheresoever it liketh you to address the vessel, it taketh the course you shall direct; so much to your commendation for the happy success hitherto, that your Honour has cause to be afraid of so general a conceit of your wisdom, sufficiency, and fidelity." This was the testimony of a Catholic, and, consequently, of a quondam adversary; but it was in this year also that he obtained the like commendation from an actual adversary and rebel, the Lord Paget, who, according to evidence delivered in the form of a confession, is stated, to have wished his Lordship's head on London Bridge, since no prince in Christendom had such a statesman.—See Birch's Memoirs, and the Confession of Edward Boord, Strype's Annals, iv. No. xlvi.

domestic afflictions, as well as public business; for Captain Allen, writing to Mr. Anthony Bacon, then abroad, in the very year in which Lord Burghley suffered the loss of his wife, observes in his letter, "there was never in Court such emulation, such envy, such back-biting, as is now at this time:"* he had just before told him, that "the Earl of Essex had chased Mr. Raleigh from the Court, and confined him into Ireland;" "conjecture you," he adds, "the rest of that matter."

But we need not enter further into these particulars at present, but turn to consider the course of public affairs this year. The assistance given by the Queen to the King of France, could not fail to excite an anxiety on the part of the English Government, that his affairs on the other side of the water should be conducted with the utmost prudence, and that he should have his eye on the places of greatest importance to the common enemy; of which the towns in Brittany seemed to be the chiefest, as most accessible to the Spaniards in sending succours to the Leaguers. This, therefore, seems to have occupied much of Lord Burghley's attention at this time, and to have led him to write many letters of remonstrance, as though Henry were content to have the use of English soldiers and English money, without sufficient deference to the Queen's advice, or such care to inform her of his movements as she had a right to expect; whereby, as he expresses himself in some of his letters, she might possibly become less inclined to assist him. Henry appears to have thought more of the recovery of Paris, than of securing the sea coasts, or even the Flemish frontier, against the Duke of Parma; whereas, the English Government thought his first attention should be directed to the exposed provinces of Normandy, Brittany, and Picardy. The English Confederates saw this,† as well as the

* The Lord Treasurer seems to have been much annoyed in the year 1590 with the severity of the proceedings against Sir John Perrott, late Deputy of Ireland (a reputed son of Henry VIII.). Camden imputes these proceedings to the malice of Hatton.—Consult and compare Lodge's Illustrations, vol. iii. pp. 11, and 20. Sir John appears to have been hasty and impetuous, but a good governor of Ireland, having a perfect knowledge of the insincerity and secret practises of the Irish Chieftains, to whom Elizabeth was inclined to give too ready an ear, and by whom she was often deceived.

† Among those who were sent to reinforce and assist the King, Essex himself was one; who, arriving in Normandy, was surprised not to find the King there, as he had reason to expect, and regarded his absence as little less than a breach of promise. He went to the King to lay before him the extraordinary situation in which it placed his army, but it had not the effect he wished. Essex afterwards lost a brother before Rouen.—Birch, i. 74.

Lord Treasurer, but Henry had a different plan in hand, which excited some unpleasant feelings towards him in the Queen's Court. Some of Lord Burghley's letters upon this subject are to be seen in Dr. Birch's Memoirs. It is no wonder that Henry IV. should rather look to the enemies that were in the heart of his kingdom, and in occupation of his metropolis, considering them as subjects in rebellion, whose allegiance was to be secured; but in Philip he had a competitor for the crown, and, in truth, the Spaniards had given him sufficient proof of this, if he would have attended to it; for, in a letter to Lord Talbot, preserved by Lodge, iii. 13, 14, it is written, Nov. 20, 1590, "He" (the Viscount Turenne, Henry's Minister in England) "goeth away about the 23d of this month, to Germany, where God send him aid, for his Majesty has great need of it, for the Leaguers and enemies entereth his country, very dangerously for his State, and not a little for us, for they already are entered into Bretagne with 4000 mere Spaniards." And again, "the Duke of Parma lyeth in the heart of France, doing daily great harm to the country." Voltaire, speaking of Philip's designs in 1590 and 1591, says, "He insensibly accustomed the French to depend on the crown of Spain; for, on one hand, he sent sufficient succours to the League to hinder it from being crushed, but not enough to render it independent."—"His aim was not to conquer France, like Portugal, but to oblige the French to offer him the government."—"And so firmly persuaded was he, that France must fall into his hands, that he constantly used to say, My city of Paris, my city of Orleans, my city of Rouen."

It is under this year that we ought, perhaps, to consider ourselves called upon to notice a very ill-told story affecting the character of Lord Burghley; we mean his supposed hard treatment of the poet Spenser. In the short Life, prefixed to his Works, by Hughes, in six vols., published in the year 1715, it is represented, that he was not only neglected by the Lord Treasurer, but incurred his hatred, in consequence of some reflections which that Lord took to himself, in the Poem of Mother Hubbard's Tale. The verses are too well-known to be repeated, and, after all, only one line is suspected of bringing the charge home to Lord Burghley.—See p. ix. Some offence appears certainly to have been given at Court, but to whom is not certain. The Author's account of Detraction, in the sixth book, is judged to be a proof of this.—See p. ib. The story most known, however, and most dwelt upon, is this: that the Queen, being disposed to confer some gratuity on Spenser, which Lord Burghley judged to be too much, she told the latter to give him what was reason; but, as nothing came, the disappointed poet is reported to have reminded her Majesty of her good intentions, by the following lines :

"I was promised on a time
To have reason for my Rhime;
From that time unto this season,
I received nor Rhyme nor reason."

Which verses, however, so far from being indicative of any spite against so eminent a man as Spenser, are now known to have proceeded from Queen Elizabeth's great flatterer, Churchyard. The original story, therefore, may well pass for a discredited reflection on the great man whose life we are recording.*

We have had occasion to mention Standen as an accredited agent of Walsingham's, and his correspondence with Lord Burghley from Bourdeaux. As he was now about to return to Spain to render service to the Queen's Majesty, we may be able, in some degree, to judge of the politics of Europe, from the following instructions given to him by Lord Burghley himself; and which may very well serve to shew, though the instructions themselves are oddly worded, that age had not yet abated the vigour of his intellects, or lessened his vigilant anxiety for the defence of England and her friends. The following are the instructions to Mr. Standen, to guide him in the intelligence for which he made himself responsible, and of which the English Government may be said to have stood in need: "That it would please you of all preparations by sea or land to give me timely notice, especially of such as concern us, or our nearest neighbours, France, Bretagne, Flanders, and of all the private practices upon the Queen's sacred person; of the state and time of the King of Spain's fleet returning daily; of any intelligence that from hence that King or his Ministers receive by any unnatural subject, and of that, all the circumstances possible whereby we may find the snake in our bosoms; what practices are between Spain and Scotland, and who be the instruments thereof; what with Ireland, and by what means; what jealousies between the King of Spain, his son and daughter; who be the favourites of each party; of her marriage with the Emperor or Duke of Guise or any other; what suspicion or confidence the King hath of the Duke of Parma, and whether he mind to displease him; how he standeth with the Pope that now is, and how with other Princes of Italy; how with his own subjects at home and abroad; and how with Turkey, Persia, Barbary, East India, West India; what Englishmen he hath at his pension in Spain or elsewhere: whether Cardinal Allen comes to Flanders; and what Englishmen are about him, and how entertained by the Pope or other Princes."

There seems to have been at this time a great resort of persons of all nations to Spain, but with hostile views upon England, as Mr. Standen expressed in a letter to Mr. Bacon. Speaking of the numbers of French which came thither, and which he said made the Spaniards to stand upon their tiptoes, "These French," he adds, "the Scots, Irish, and Spaniards, have divided the Englishman's coat, but it will prove the history of M. d'Argenton's Bear; the First, and the Scots demanding only money, and the Irish 10,000 men, which they shall have."

These instructions alone, had they been addressed to a regular minister, would have displayed a good model of diplomacy, and are, at all events, quite sufficient to shew, that Lord Burghley was very much too capable of carrying on the affairs to deserve to be set aside for so young a man as Essex; though among those who thought otherwise were the two Bacons, Lord Burghley's near relatives—Anthony Bacon being the elder, and the younger the very celebrated Francis Bacon.

It belongs to us to have to contemplate the great Lord Bacon, as he has since been called, as a young man, anxious to secure to himself a maintenance and professional reputation; his mother, Lady Bacon, was the sister of Lady Burghley; and he therefore clearly stood in the degree of relationship to Lord Burghley, of a nephew; but his talents, so far from being fully understood in those times (see d'Israeli, iii. 83, 84), are scarcely yet, perhaps, appreciated at their full value. It is utterly impossible to say how much we are beholden to Lord Bacon, for his mere suggestion of pursuing strictly experimental inquiries, instead of putting up with the fancies and conceits of empirics in all the several branches of science; but Lord Burghley could not be expected to see, in his nephew, all these seeds of greatness, and immortality of Fame. He very reasonably looked upon him as a young lawyer, and as far as business, profit, and employment were concerned, an idle man to waste his time upon any other studies or pursuits.*

* He seems to have been, as well as his brother Anthony, very careless of expenses, and in such respects a cause of trouble both to his brother (a very kind and affectionate one), and his mother.—See Birch i. 95, 96.

It is absurd to talk, as some do, of Lord Burghley's neglect of the great Bacon; he tried to serve him as a lawyer, without any very rapid success, it is true,* but it would be doing Lord Burghley a great injustice to fancy that it was at all in his power to foresee what a great man his nephew would become in the eyes of posterity, as a writer and philosopher, or that if he could have foreseen it, he would have done any thing to check his career as such. It was much more consistent with his habitual prudence, to keep his nephew close, if he could, to his professional studies, to which he seems to have thought, too great an attention to general knowledge could not fail to be a great interruption. The father of the great Sir Thomas More seems to have had the same apprehensions, when he absolutely lessened his son's College allowance, to prevent his attending a variety of Professors to the neglect of his law studies. We may add, that Lord Burghley had some reason given him to be suspicious of the higher branches of education, by his graceless son-in-law, Lord Oxford.

Essex had a hold upon the Bacons very soon, and Francis (afterwards Lord Bacon) candidly acknowledged that his attachment to Essex proceeded from a belief and persuasion that he was "the fittest instrument to do good to the state,"†

* In answer to a letter addressed to him by Lady Bacon, about her sons, Lord Burghley wrote to her from Theobalds, August 29, 1593, that he thought "her care for them was no less than they both deserved, being so qualified in learning and virtue, as if they had a supply of more health, they wanted nothing; but none are, or very few, ab omni parte beati. For such are not alert, but subject to temptations from the highway to heaven. For my good will to them, though I am of less power to do my friends good than the world thinketh, yet they shall not want the intention to do them good." Francis Bacon, in fact, had offended the Queen by a speech he made in Parliament upon the subsidies; and even Essex could not appease her displeasure.

† Francis Bacon boasted of having knit his brother Anthony's service to be at Essex's disposing, but Mr. Anthony Bacon himself wrote thus of his own attachment to Essex's party, or rather alienation from the Cecils: "On the one side," said he, "conning over, I found nothing but fair words, which make fools fain, and yet even in those no offer or hopeful assistance of real kindness, which I thought I might justly expect at the Lord Treasurer's hands, who had inned my ten years' harvest into his own barn, without any half-penny charge." As these words seem to carry in them some reflection upon the Lord Treasurer, and possibly in his character of Guardian or Master of the Wards, we are inclined to copy the following passage from a letter of Mr. Francis Bacon's to the same Lord, written in the year 1594; speaking of his suit for the office of Solicitor General, he writes, "Lastly, however this matter go, let me enjoy your Lordship's good favour and help, as I have done in regard of my private estate, which, as I have not altogether neglected, so I have but negligently attended, and which hath been bettered only by yourself (the Queen except), and not by any other in matter of importance."—Annals, iv. p. 296. It is necessary to what good does not appear; and probably it is the wisest way to resolve all this into a youthful persuasion that the Lord Treasurer was becoming superannuated, and that his measures partook of the coldness of old age. Certain it is, that Essex and the Bacons were apparently at this time combined, as far as they could be (considering the near relationship of the latter), against the Cecils; but much should be imputed to their want of experience, and mistaken judgment of persons and things. It was not likely that Lord Burghley should expect "so much good to the state," from surrendering the helm into the hands of such a young and adventurous pilot as Essex, especially at such a period; but his nephew Francis (from the respect we now bear to his memory) shall at least be allowed to speak for himself; "and therefore," says he, (that is because he judged Essex to be so fit an instrument to do good,) "I applied myself wholly to him, in a manner which I think happeneth rarely amongst men; for I did not only labour carefully and industriously in that he set me about, whether it were matter of advice or otherwise; but, neglecting the Queen's service, mine own fortune, and, in a sort, my vocation, I did nothing but devise and ruminate with myself, to the best of my understanding, propositions and memorials of anything that might concern his Lordship's honour, fortune, or service. And on the other side, I must and will ever acknowledge my Lord's love, trust, and favour towards me, and last of all his liberality."

We are much mistaken if this does not bespeak more of youthful fascination, than of any sound judgment as to the ability of Lord Essex to serve the nation better than it had been served by his aged relative. Bacon himself, indeed, wrote it apologetically;* but as it applies to the Cecils, it plainly shews how little reason the latter had to look upon Essex's party, or his friends, with any very favourable eye; and, indeed, many instances soon occurred of their misapcompare different accounts of this particular period, since it is impossible to form a proper idea of Lord Burghley's character from Birch's Memoirs, which, though of great importance as historical records, are notoriously compiled from the papers of a party adverse to the Cecils.

* It must not be denied that Bacon saw into many of Lord Essex's foibles, particularly his violence. "My Lord," he writes in his apology, addressed to the Earl of Devonshire, "had a settled opinion, that the Queen could be brought to nothing but by a kind of necessity and authority; and I well remember, when, by violent courses, he had got his will, he would ask me, 'Now, Sir, whose principles be true?'" for Bacon had much admonished him to the contrary; but there were others who rather encouraged him to pursue violent measures, leading him on thereby to his ruin, of which much may be seen in the article appropriated to the Earl's Secretary, Cuff, in the enlarged edition of the Biographia Britannica.

prehension of the real state of the kingdom, among which we should reckon their great anxiety about the Catholics, whom they blamed the Lord Treasurer for persecuting now more than ever, as though they were free from all suspicion, and totally harmless; and yet, in a proclamation put forth this year, we find the following account given of their arts and intrigues: "And, furthermore, because it is certainly known and proved by common experience, upon the apprehension of sundry of the said traitorous persons sent into the realm, that they do come into the same by secret creeks and landing places, disguised both in names and persons; some in apparel as soldiers, mariners, or merchants; pretending that they have heretofore been taken prisoners, and put into gallies, and delivered. Some come in as gentlemen, with contrary names, in comely apparel, as though they had travelled into foreign countries for knowledge; and generally all, for the most part, as soon as they are crept in, are clothed like gentlemen, in apparel, and many as gallants; yea, in all colours, and with feathers, and such like, disguising themselves; and many of them in their behaviour as ruffians, far off to be thought or suspected to be Friars, Priests, Jesuits, or Popish scholars;* and of these many do attempt to resort to the Universities and houses of law."†

And, the next paper sets forth "certain questions to be administered to such as are to be suspected will adhere to the Pope, or the King of Spain, if he should invade the realm."‡ Here was the hazard; this resort of disguised Jesuits was,

* On the 1st of July, 1591, Lord Derby wrote to Lord Shrewsbury, of the execution of two seminaries that very day, for affirming that if the kingdom were invaded, they would fight for the Pope, or if the Pope commanded it, slay the Queen; and, in the postscript, his Lordship adds, "One of these seminaries was at the high race at Croydon, all in green and velvet, well mounted upon a good gelding, having also a pistol at his side; insomuch as it was conceived he meant ill toward her Majesty, if she had been there."

† Annals, iv. No. xlii.

‡ This proclamation exposed Lord Burghley to the most acrimonious attacks from the fugitives and Spanish party abroad, but especially from Persons and Creswell, the first of whom wrote a Responsio ad Edictum, the other a tract intitled Exemplar Literarum Missarum è Germaniâ ad D. Gulielmum Cecilium, Consiliarium regium. A more wilful misrepresentation of things could not have been penned. A specimen may be seen in note EE of Dr. Lingard's fifth volume; but as nobody could speak more properly of them than that author has done, we forbear to copy what may be read there. The author, indeed, speaks with no small indignation of the domiciliary visits to which the proclamation gave occasion, and no doubt they were very unpleasant, and, in some instances, oppressive; but those who had actually to provide for the safety of the Queen and nation, must be supposed to have had better information than it is in our power properly to appreciate, and may thereby have been led to conclude that nothing could avert the dangers that in all likelihood, entirely intended to prepare the way for another attack upon England; and though the precautions were no doubt of a very unpleasant nature, they can scarcely be judged to have been unnecessary, when Standen, who most complained of them, as offensive to all the Catholic States of Europe, was the very man who confessed that the concourse of foreigners in Spain, as well as the Spaniards themselves, "had already divided the Englishman's coat:" a very intelligible intimation of a fresh attempt to invade and spoil the kingdom. The severity of the Proclamation had certainly the effect of deterring some persons from passing into England; and of course those who had the wisdom to stay away, had nothing to fear; but, in fact, the severity of the proceedings was not altogether so great as has been pretended.* The following is one of the articles of examination:—

threatened, but a timely detection of secret enemies. The necessity was deplorable, but then the times were also deplorable. In the very answers to the proclamation in question, it was maintained that the Pope had a right to employ the arms of Catholic Princes, and to depose apostate Sovereigns, for the benefit of religion. The armada had afforded a practical proof of such assumed rights, by means of external foes; but internal foes were, with great reason, judged to be acting upon similar principles, within the very bosom of the kingdom, eager "to divide the Englishman's coat," if they could but get hold of it for such purposes. Who can wonder that, in endeavouring to preserve what was so notoriously condemned, some excesses should take place? We must repeat, that we do not pretend to excuse, but to account for, the severities exercised. One thing we must protest against, as likely to mislead unprejudiced readers, we mean that of singling out particular cases, either against the Catholics or Protestants; both had their faults; but if the Catholics, in their histories, insist only on cases of Protestant persecution, and the Protestants only on cases of Catholic persecution, it is not fair. Let them be mutually passed over, forgiven and forgotten; or brought into comparison, by a statement of particulars on both sides. This is the only fair way of judging. Domiciliary visits were bad enough, and torture on either side was worse; but if Elizabeth were severe in her government, in resentment of provocations, Philip was always a cold-blooded, deliberate tyrant and persecutor, and always countenanced by the Popes, on the ground of religion, even by Sixtus V., who hated him, but who did it for decency sake, as Head of the Church.

* To shew how difficult it must be for any historian, wishing to write without prejudice, and really to do justice to all parties, we cannot help observing, that, in the very same book (Birch's Memoirs), where so much is to be read of the bitter persecution of Puritans and Papists, at this period of the Queen's reign, we find the following compliment paid to England by a very learned and worthy foreigner, M. Daneau (Danæus), in a letter to Mr. Bacon from L'Lescar, in France, Sept. 17, 1592; he expresses therein his frequent desires of having it in his power to live in England, "That most happy country, the seat of peace and piety, through the Divine favour, and the wise government of that Phœnix of the world, the excellent Queen Elizabeth, the most compassionate mother of the poor French, and the Hospitaliere of all the children of God."

"Item, in your examination of any persons by virtue of this Commission, you shall not press any one to answer to any questions of their conscience for matter of religion, other than to cause them answer whether they do usually come to church? and why they do not? and if you shall perceive that they are wilful recusants, then you shall examine them upon any matters concerning their allegiance to her Majesty, and of their devotion to the Pope or to the King of Spain: or upon their maintenance of any Jesuits, Seminaries, Priests, or other persons, sent from Rome, or from any parts beyond seas, to dissuade any subjects from their obedience to the Queen's Majesty."

It has always been a difficulty, occasioned great confusion, and led to many misconceptions, to distinguish properly between a conscientious profession of the Catholic religion, and a disposition or obligation, in consequence of that, to support the authority of the Church of Rome, in its efforts, even by force of arms (as by the Spaniard or otherwise), to extirpate the Protestant heresy, and restore the Romish religion. Through this confusion, every resistance of Catholic intrigue directed against Protestant governments, has obtained the name of religious persecution, whereas it has generally been merely matter of political precaution.* To revert to the order just copied, a wilful recusant, was a conscientious one; one who could not conform or go to church with a sound conscience; by which he was proved to be a zealous and sincere Catholic; and being so, and in England (the most proscribed country in Europe, and one continually threatened with invasion), where could be the harm or injustice of making some inquiries as to the allegiance of such persons to a Protestant excommunicated Queen?—Let the Popes answer for such severities,† for they were certainly the

* Mr. Standen, who, at this time, was a great stickler for the relaxation of all severe proceedings against the Catholics, had himself declared, that "for all such priests as should deal in matters of state, he would have them punished without mercy." In answer to this gentleman's remark, Lord Burghley made this observation: "In very truth, for whereof I know not the contrary, there is no Catholic persecuted to the danger of life here, but such as profess themselves, by obedience to the Pope, to be no subjects to the Queen; and though their outward pretence be, to be sent from the seminaries to convert people to their religion, yet without reconciling of them from their obedience to the Queen they never give them absolution. Such in our realm as refuse to come to our churches, and yet do not discover their obedience to the Queen, be taxed with fines, according to the law, without danger of their lives; and if Mr. Standen were truly informed of this manner of proceeding, and would judge indifferently thereof, he might change his mind."

† As the Catholics have constantly declaimed against England for its severities at this time, it may not be amiss to inquire how mercifully his most Catholic Majesty conducted himself occasion of them. Standen himself could only be employed as a thief to catch a thief, for he had been a zealous Catholic; and, on that account, had quitted England in 1563, to serve the Queen of Scots; afterwards he became a pensioner to the King of Spain, and was employed to raise disturbances in Scotland. Sir Francis Walsingham has the credit of having, by a pension of 100*l.* per annum, engaged him in the service of Queen Elizabeth, but chiefly because he knew so much of continental affairs; on which grounds if he could have been trusted, he might certainly have been very serviceable, but the probability is, that he was still false; of which we shall have more to say hereafter.

The Lord Treasurer had little less trouble with the Puritans this year than with the Papists; of which a pretty full account may be seen in Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, book iv. chap. v. and vi. It is an unpleasant subject to dwell upon, but, as the opinions of Lawyers, Canonists, &c., seem to have been formally taken, it is scarcely incumbent on us to go farther into the matter, than to make the reference we have done, especially to the papers in the Appendix connected with those chapters. We shall only observe, that if Lord Burghley were looking in his old age to some rest from his public labours and cares, they could not possibly have been more increased than they were at this time, by the perseverance of the Puritans, and the threats of both Papists and Puritans, if Haskett may be accounted one of the latter.—See Annals, iv. Nos. 48, 49. and Rapin. The Queen's refusal to dismiss him, aggravated by the attacks of the young party arrayed against him, with Essex at its head, may surely account for his temper being a little soured at this time, especially as we happen to know, that while most of these things were transacting, he was laid up by sickness. [Life of Whitgift, vol. ii. 93.] But he appears to have been grossly misrepresented upon this head by some who went into foreign parts, to evade the severity of the laws, [See Birch, i. 84.] and who would have had the world believe that all mercy had perished with Leicester and Walsingham.

towards his own subjects at the same period. The following appears amongst some advertisements from Spain this year, transmitted to the Lord Treasurer, by Henry Carminck, a merchant then in Spain, dated the 21st of April, 1591. "There grew in Madrid a mutiny by the Commons of the town against the King, for that he pressed them and all the country with new impositions. Upon which tumult there were to the number of sixty hanged, and about two hundred whipped and carted.—Annals, iv. No. lv. It is in this way of comparison that the severities of the two parties should be judged, if judged at all, for the purposes of history.

We must not conclude this year without noticing the death of Sir Christopher Hatton, Lord Chancellor. He died, according to Camden, on the 20th of September, 1591, which does not quite agree with other accounts; Dr. Birch, in his Memoirs, seems to fix it in November; both of them conceive his death to have been hastened by the Queen's rigour in demanding of him a considerable sum, which he had received for first-fruits and tenths, but it is very doubtful whether this story be true; more true, it seems to be, that she often visited him in his illness, and manifested great anxiety for his recovery; and so far from burthening his property with any heavy demands after his decease, she remitted to his nephew and heir,* all the claims she had upon it. He was so adverse to the Puritans,† and so lenient to the Papists, as to have fallen under a suspicion of being a Papist himself;‡ but he has more generally the credit of having acted upon a nobler principle, and to have professed a wish to exclude both fire and sword from all questions of religion. If all the stories told of him be true, it might be difficult to say, whether he was most indebted to his feet or his head for his advancement in life; but it is creditable to him, at all events, to have to record, that if his skill in dancing brought him

* Sir William Hatton, married to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Cecil, afterwards Lord Exeter.—See Nichols' mistake, ii. 123. In the Biographia Britannica, art. Coke, this lady is erroneously called the sister of Thomas, Lord Burghley.

† Upon the death of Hatton, Essex, who was as much the friend of the Puritans, as the former had been the contrary, sought to succeed him in the Chancellorship of Oxford, but Whitgift interposed to prevent it, [Birch, i. 75.] and the Queen's relative, Lord Buckhurst, was chosen instead, or, perhaps, we should rather say appointed, for it certainly appears from some letters in Murdin, 649, 650. that had it been brought to a regular election, Essex would have had a majority of votes. How severely he felt this disappointment, especially, as proceeding from the Queen, may be judged from his letter from Rouen to Sir Robert Cecil, ib., and yet the Queen, by the very next paper, appears to have been deeply concerned for his personal safety, p. 651. Twenty-four was certainly an early age for a Chancellor of an University, but he had sought to succeed Leicester three years earlier.

‡ As a despoiler of Church property, he had certainly more of the Puritan in him than of the Papist. Hatton Garden still serves to revive our recollections of his robbery of the See of Ely, in which he had more assistance from the Queen than redounds to her credit. A letter, indeed, which, it is said, he induced her to write to the Bishop (Cox), is so much below her dignity as to be quite disgraceful. Hatton had, oddly enough, considering the imputation cast upon him, of being a Papist, been educated under Cardinal Allen (or Alan), at St. Mary Hall, Oxford.—Birch, i. 8. See, however, the high character given of him in Lodge's Illustrations of British History, vol. ii. 220.

first into notice at court, he discharged the duties of his high office of Lord Chancellor with considerable reputation, and very much to the satisfaction of the public.

On the death of Sir Christopher, the great seal was for some months put into the hands of Commissioners, of whom the Lord Treasurer was one; who held also, at the same time, by commission from the Queen, the office of Earl Marshal,* vacant since the death of the Earl of Shrewsbury.

In the Antiquities of Westminster Abbey, third edit. 1722, is an engraving of the tomb erected there to the memory of Elizabeth, wife of Sir William Cecil, eldest son of Sir Thomas Cecil (first Lord Exeter), who died this year. She was the only daughter of Edward, Earl of Rutland.

The Queen's Progresses this summer were apparently confined to Sussex and Hampshire: Cowdray, the famous seat of Lord Montagu (Montecute), Petworth, Chichester, Portsmouth, Stanstead, Tichfield, Southampton, Winchester, and Elvetham, the seat of the Earl of Hereford.—See Nichols, vol. iii. 1591. Lord Burghley appears to have accompanied her all the time. At Lord Montagu's, it is recorded, that she saw after dinner from a turret, "sixteen bucks all having fayre lawe, pulled down with greyhounds in a laund or lawn."

We ought not to conclude our account of the year 1591, without observing, that it was rendered memorable by the foundation of the University of Dublin by Queen Elizabeth, on the suggestion of Lord Burghley, who drew up the plan of education; the first stone was laid on the 13th of March, 1591, and on the 9th of January, 1593, the first students were admitted into it. It was styled, "The College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, near Dublin, founded by the most serene Queen Elizabeth;" a new charter was granted many years afterwards, viz. 1637. It was originally erected on the site of the dissolved

* See a curious case referred to him as Earl Marshal this year, by a lady at Court; it was a question of precedency, between Lady Frances Cooke and Lady Cheke, both nearly connected with him by their marriages; Lady Cheke being the relict of the brother of his first wife, and Lady Frances, the wife of the brother of his last Lady; she was the daughter of the Lord John Grey of Pyrgo, and, consequently, nearly allied to the House of Suffolk. Strype, who mentions the circumstance in his Life of Sir John Cheke, does not profess to know how the dispute was adjusted; of the high birth of Lady Frances, there could be no doubt, but it would be difficult to say how she came to be called Lady Frances, as the daughter of Lord John Grey, or how she came to fancy her degree to be that of a younger daughter of a Viscount, which, it seems, was the rank she claimed. The title of Lady Francis, had the Queen allowed her to be so called, would have given her the rank of an Earl's daughter.—See Strype's Life of Cheke, ch. v. sect. viii.

Augustinian Monastery of All Saints, in the suburbs near Dublin, which had been granted by King Henry VIII. to the Mayors and Citizens of that city, and by them transferred to this use.

When we first began what has rather unfortunately been too much regarded as a mere life of Lord Burghley, as though his private concerns were of greater importance, and a better subject for history, than his public character, we very early directed the attention of the reader to the affairs of Scotland; feeling persuaded, in our own minds, that that portion of the British Isle would be found to have presented the greatest difficulties to the statesmen of England, from the death of James the V. to the end, at least, of the life of Lord Burghley. The political life, we mean, of that great man; for he can scarcely be said to have led any other life from the days of his earliest maturity, to the very last moment of his earthly existence.

Following Camden, we shall find, according to the circumstances above, that though Lord Burghley was now gradually sinking into his grave, Scotland required as much looking to as ever; this and the foregoing year being distinguished by some very extraordinary attempts there, to get possession of the King's person, in order to turn him away from his English connexions; and, if practicable, from the Protestant faith. "King James," says Rapin, "began to be ruled by suspicious persons; and the Queen received advice, that the Spaniards, assisted by the Catholics, were contriving some dangerous plot, and were countenanced by the Earls of Huntley, Angus, and Errol: this plot was to raise a subscription for a large sum of money in Scotland;* and then an army of 30,000 Spaniards was to land in that kingdom about the end of the year 1593, which was to be headed by Bothwell, with a body of troops, and all these were to march into England, to revenge the Queen of Scots' death:" that is, under that pretence; for whatever the Scottish Lords, or James himself might feel upon that score, Philip, we may be sure, was acting upon other motives, as we may gather indeed from the following passage in the confession of a Jesuit, taken in the month of August this year, and subscribed with his own hand, before the Lord Keeper Puckering, Lord Buckhurst, and Mr. Fortescue, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

* This must be wrong. We have it on the authority of Lord Burghley, that in the conspiracy of the above Lords, it had been determined that the King of Spain should send the conspirators certain great sums of money to wage forces to join with his forces, which he should send by sea to Scotland, and therewith to enter and make invasion into England, and to overrule the King there, and to make change of religion within that realm." A person well acquainted with the politics of Spain, wrote at this time to Mr. Bacon, "What villany or treachery may be done for money, the Spaniard will not spare to do it."—Birch, i. 95.

" The next matter that I heard (in Rome), was of the great hope there was of the King of Scots that he would become Catholic; which was the rather believed, for that one Tyry, a Scotch Jesuit, and one William Holt, an English Jesuit, who both came from thence, reported his inclination that way—with whom they had spoken privately divers times; as likewise, with many other Noblemen in that country; and Morgan, who wrote divers letters to the Cardinal in Rome, that shortly all the Scotch holy Bishops should be recalled home to their livings, and made suit that help might be made for reclaiming England by aiding the Scottish King. Which matter was much furthered by Dr. Lewis, now Bishop of Casan, and agent for the Scottish nation.

" Yet after the death of the Queen of Scots, both Dr. Allen and Persons wrote to stir up the Spanish King, who, as I have heard Persons say, could never be persuaded to attempt anything against England in her lifetime, objecting that he would travail for others. That she being dead, the expectation was increased for the last invasion."*

We have already intimated our belief, that Philip's threats of coming into England to help and release Mary, were fallacious; and that if his Armada had been ready for the invasion of England in 1587, his only hope would have been, that both the Queens might fall in the struggle, for the furtherance of his own claims to the inheritance of the vacant crown. It is melancholy to have to insist upon such duplicity; but where the credit of others is at stake, it must be done. The pretence of helping Mary was so plausible, as to increase the odium to which Elizabeth and her ministers have at all times been exposed, while Philip has the credit given him of more amiable feelings; whereas, the mere pretence of being preparing to help her, of which Mary, and all her friends in England, particularly her Catholic friends, must have wished to make the most, hurried them into such practices as (we will not say quickened Elizabeth's resentments, though that was one effect, but) rendered them daily and hourly more decidedly dangerous to Elizabeth. In short, they were helping the crafty

* In the year 1594, Persons published a book under the name of Doleman, purporting to be "A Conference about the next succession of the Crown of England;" a book so anxiously suppressed, that it was made high treason even to possess a copy. The eighth chapter contained the claims of the King and Prince of Spain to the succession of England.

Spaniard to sharpen the sword which was to cut off Elizabeth's head. Mary was detected in the act of sharpening that sword, as far as she could do it, and suffered as a conspirator, because the purposes of her associates could not be mistaken. Philip would have come, if Mary's release would have helped him to the throne; but, while she lived, she was an obstacle to his ultimate views. Unfortunately for her, her claims were better than Philip's, though both depended on the fall of Elizabeth; to preserve the latter, therefore, it was better to rob him of the false pretence of helping Mary, and let the world see, that if he came at all, it was to help himself; he did come, and his design was seen through; and the sword that was supposed to be sharpening here to help him in the cause of Mary, was turned against himself, and applied to the protection of Elizabeth.*

But as Mary was dead, and all help to her cause put out of the question, revenge became a new pretence, and one probably equally false. It was, however, a serviceable pretence with a view to Scotland, which was regarded by French and Spaniards as much as ever (but by the latter most particularly at this time), as the "stepping stone," to England. With the revenge of the death of Mary was coupled, of course, the restoration of the Popish religion in Scotland; and, as Camden relates, Jesuits were at work there, "tempting and tampering every where with the noblemen for the advancement of that religion." Of Bothwell's attempt to get possession of the King's person, we have no further occasion to speak than to refer to such authors as have had occasion to write more particularly of the affairs of Scotland, than is the case with ourselves, especially at this period of our history, when Lord Burghley's labours were drawing to a conclusion, and his son preparing to take his place in the Queen's

* We have a further opportunity of referring to Mr. Turner, in support of our own arguments and reflections on these several points; he appears to have seen things exactly in the same light.—See his Reign of Elizabeth, vol. ii. 490, 491. The following passage, 492, is remarkable;—"This great difference in the position and safety of the government and country, between what they had been during Mary's life, and what they had become since her death, evinces the political importance and efficacy of that legal execution, which she had wilfully incurred, although compassionating humanity compels us to regret it."

Having made this reference to Mr. Turner, we may cite him further, as having duly noticed the strange mortality among the Popes at this time. On the 29th of August, 1590, died Sixtus V.; on the 27th of September of the same year, died his successor, Urban VII., having been Pope only twelve days; Gregory XIV., who came next, reigned only ten months; and his successor, Innocent IX., but two.

council, and to accomplish the great object of uniting the two crowns. It is sufficient for our purposes to shew, that there was to the very last no relaxation of his care to preserve his sovereign from the wiles and stratagems of foreign enemies. The Spaniard was evidently bent upon revenging, not Mary's death, in 1587, but his own defeat in 1588; evidence had been given that he had sworn to do so, "although he should spend all he had, even to the socket of his candlestick;" and with these known intentions, nothing could be more alarming than the opportunity afforded him, under pretence (which also was apparently a false pretence) of assisting the Catholic league, of getting possession of the towns of Bretagne;* Brest, as it appears, being his great object, whence he expected to have "sixteen great ships, with ten thousand men."† Of these dangers to England, Henry IV. appeared to be extremely negligent, which Elizabeth greatly resented, and with very just reason, having sincerely performed all her own engagements in the supplies afforded him, both of men and money; and had it been possible for her, with any safety, to have withdrawn her troops, and left him to the mercy of his enemies, it is probable she would have done it, but the Spaniards were to be watched, and, as much as possible, impeded in their attempts even upon France.

It appears, however, that in the autumn of this year there was such likelihood of fresh attempts being made upon England, as to excite a sort of panic in the breast of the Lord Admiral, who in August, while the Queen was in progress, wrote most importunately to the Lord Treasurer upon the subject, having received advice by express from Portsmouth, of a Spanish fleet being actually on the seas ready to invade England, lamenting the Queen's absence from Court at so critical a moment. His letter bears the usual marks of urgent dispatch, being directed to "The Right Honourable, my very good Lord, the Lord Treasurer, for her Majesty's service, C. Howard. Haste, haste, post-haste; haste, with all speed." Letters were also sent by his Lordship at the same time to the Lords Buckhurst and Cobham, to look diligently to the coasts of Sussex and Kent. From another letter, written three or four days afterwards by the same Lord to the Lord Treasurer, it is curious to see how much the judgment and counsel of the latter were still looked to as the best directors, even upon maritime affairs, and the confidence the Lord Admiral placed in his opinions, as to the defence of the nation against the Spaniard. In this second letter, the prospect of an immediate attack seems to have somewhat abated, but he informs Lord Burghley, that the fleet that had been discovered, was of fifty sail of ships, and that if they had not put into Newhaven [Havre de Grace], they might be gone to Scotland. "If your Lordship do remember," he adds, "what Mr. Moulre the Scot declared unto your Lordship and myself at Greenwich, this may very well fall out to be the same [i.e. the same fleet then discoursed of], and if it be so, it must be more than I here set down [of ships to be put in readiness] that will fetch them out of the Frith, if they once possess it." The conclusion of this letter must not be passed over.

"My Lord, as you write, it is fitter her Majesty were at some standing house near, than wandering so far off, to see but that she hath already seen; and not much worth the labour. God bless her Majesty, and send her well home—and that these great and weighty causes may be weightily considered; for every year will grow more dangerous than other. The enemy hath the start of us too much already. Let us meet with it in some time. The plot is great and dangerous that is laid; and although it has been once checked [in 1588], the malice was not gone nor the game ended; we must look for more play, and God send us no worse luck. And so I commend you to the protection of Almighty God, to keep you in health, for by the Lord, we cannot spare you in this world. 1st Sept. at 11 o'clock at night.

"Your loving Friend, and ever at your commandment,

"C. Howard."

The allusion made in the above letters to the Queen's progress this year, as a hazardous "wandering afar off, to see but that she hath already seen," evidently refers to her second visit to Oxford, which took place at this time, and to which, it seems, she had been invited by her relative, the new Chancellor, Lord Buckhurst,* to give her sanction to some regulations, which had escaped the notice of his predecessor, Sir Christopher Hatton.† Her Majesty began her journey by a visit to Bisham Abbey, in the county of Berks, the seat of Sir Edward Hoby, whose mother was then living, and who, after the death of his father, Sir Philip Hoby, had married the Lord Russel; she was sister to the deceased Lady Burghley, and one of the learned and very accomplished daughters of Sir

Anthony Cooke.* From Bisham the Queen went to Sir Henry Lees, at Quarendon, in the vale of Aylesbury, and from thence, early in the month of September, into Gloucestershire, to Sudeley Castle, the seat of the Lord Chandos, the place which had fomerly given a title to her early admirer or favourite, or both, the Lord Admiral Seymour. From Sudeley, proceeding by Woodstock, where she rested some days, she arrived at Oxford, Sept. 22, and was received with all the same ceremonies that had taken place on her first visit, twenty-six years before; in which she had many opportunities of displaying her learning, by answering the Latin speeches addressed to her in Latin, and even the Greek in Greek. In the midst of one of her orations, as it is particularly recorded, casting her eye aside, and seeing the old Lord Treasurer Burghley (Cecil) standing on his lame feet for want of a stool, she hastily called to have one brought for him, and then proceeded, as though no interruption had occurred. This venerable statesman was attended during the whole time, as Chancellor of Cambridge, by two Masters from the sister University, one of whom, Mr. Philip Stringer, wrote a particular account of all that passed. On this occasion, the whole Privy Council was sumptuously entertained in Merton Hall, by Sir Henry Saville the Warden; his brother, Mr. Thomas Saville, Proctor at the time, delivering an oration, in which great praises were bestowed on the Lord Treasurer (who was present), for his great care of the Commonwealth.†

On taking a last look at Oxford, at the foot of Shotover Hill, her Majesty is said to have expressed herself, in Latin, to the following effect: "Farewell, farewell, dear Oxford; God bless thee, and increase thy sons in number, holiness, and virtue." She then proceeded to Rycott, the seat of the Lord Norreys, another place which, as well as Woodstock and Sudeley, must have reminded her of past times, it being to Rycott that, in her sister's reign, she had been conducted, under restraint, on her way to Woodstock, by the Lord Williams and Sir Henry Bedingfield, as related in our first volume.

At all these places her Majesty was addressed and amused with speeches in

* In the chapel she built at Bisham, and where she buried her first husband and his brother in one tomb, were Latin and Greek inscriptions of her writing to be seen, since printed in Dart's Westminster, and Ashmole's History of Berkshire.

† Sir Henry Saville, the Warden of Merton, delivered a speech before her Majesty, on the 23d of September, which may be seen in Nichols, entitled, "D. Henrici Savilii, του μακαριτου, Oratio, habita Oxoniæ Sept. 23, 1592, Coram Reginâ ELIZABETHA." The Speech is also printed, we know not why, in the works of Roger Ascham, who died in 1568.

English and Latin, poems and pageants, as may be seen in Mr. Nichols' account of her progresses, vol. ii.*

It appears to have been in this year [1592] that a most gross libel upon the Lord Treasurer was written by the celebrated Papist, Parsons, or Persons, the coadjutor of Cardinal Allen, under the assumed name of Philopatris.†

We have seen, in the British Museum, the very account of these slanders, that was sent over to the Lord Treasurer's Secretary by one of the English intelligencers (as they were called) in foreign parts; and in the very year of which we are giving an account; and could only wonder, while we were reading it, that the writer (if it were really Persons) could condescend to invent such things. Those, however, who have read the xxxviiith chapter of the third book of Strype's Memorials of Cranmer, will know that such calumnies were not uncommon, among the writers opposed to the Reformation; he notices particularly the falsehoods to be found in Varillas' History of Heretics; and such as

* The Queen also appears to have visited Bath this year, oddly enough, according to Nichols iii. 250, "in her way to Oxford."

† Persons' principal work was published this year, under the following title: "A declaration of the true causes of the great troubles presupposed to be intended against the realm of England, wherein the indifferent reader shall manifestly perceive by whom, and by what means, the realm is brought into these pretended perils, seen and allowed." "The malignity of this libel," says Birch, "against the Lord Treasurer and his son, Sir Robert Cecil, as well as against the Queen and her government, obliged Mr. Francis Bacon immediately to undertake their defence, in an excellent discourse, intitled, 'Observations upon a libel published this present year, 1592, &c.' In this piece he shews great zeal for the honour of his uncle, whose character he draws in a most amiable light; and describes his cousin, Sir Robert, as 'a gentleman who had one of the rarest and most excellent wits in England, with a singular delivery and application of the same, whether it was to use a continued speech, or negotiate, or touch in writing, or make report, or discreetly to consider of the circumstances, and aptly to draw things to a point; to all which were joined a very good nature, and a great respect to all men, and a thorough experience of public business under his father.'" This tract of the great Lord Bacon should be carefully read by all who would wish to have a summary view of the state of England at this advanced period of Lord Burghley's life and administration. It sets forth, in proper terms, its great improvement and advancement in population, tillage, trade, commerce, currency, buildings, towns, markets, shipping, military weapons, ornamental gardening, and valuable commodities, such as plate, jewels, &c. &c., comparing it, in all these particulars, with its former condition, and the less prosperous state of foreign countries; concluding his survey, and in allusion to the above libeller, whom he convicts of many gross misrepresentations, in the following words: "Which state is such, that whosoever has been an architect in the frame thereof, under the blessing of God, and the virtues of our Sovereign, need not be ashamed of his work."

had been promulgated by Feckenham, Sanders, Allen, and Persons. It is, indeed, but too true, as has been observed, that it appears to have been a favourite system of aggression, adopted against the Protestant faith by Roman Catholic writers, from the most ignorant bigot to the most powerful polemic, to criminate the great leaders of the Reformation in Germany, France, and England. Lord Burghley could not expect to escape such criminations; but, in this instance, he fared hardly enough, being made to pay for his longevity, as the survivor of that phalanx of bad Ministers, who were to be regarded as "the causes and instruments of all misery to England, and of the perdition of the realm, by their especial authority with the Queen," Sir Nicholas Bacon, the Lord Treasurer, Leicester, Walsingham, and Hatton. We must allow for provocations; we must grant, that in the eyes of such proscribed Catholics as Persons, Sanders, and Allen, these eminent men had been the causes and instruments of the changes they deplored; and of all the misery and perdition flowing from the re-establishment of Protestantism under Elizabeth, and the second renunciation, on the part of England, of the Pope's supremacy. He professes to treat of the origin, rise, deaths, and fallings of these great men; taking them in the order of the latter, rather than of the former, "because to all good men, the remembrance of the day of their deaths and fallings was more joyful than that of their rising to honours." This joyful day, with regard to Lord Burghley, not having yet arrived, his story was to be reserved for the last, and to be, on that account, more largely treated of.*

It would appear that a certain letter or letters had been intercepted on the Continent, written by Lord Burghley, in which, speaking of his own family, some reflections had been cast on the birth or gentility of Cardinal Allen and Persons himself. This, therefore, was a fresh provocation, and if true, had better certainly have been avoided; but the retaliation resorted to was ludicrously absurd, in not only giving a false colour to all the early parts of the Lord Trea-

* Bacon, in his reply, gives a good turn to the attack upon his venerable relative. "Invectives," says he, "against favourites, or new upstarts, and sudden-risen Counsellors, may be borne with; but when it shall be practised against one that hath been Counsellor before her Majesty's time, and hath continued Counsellor longer than any other Counsellor in Europe; one that must needs have been great, if it were but by surviving alone, though he had no other excellency; one that hath passed his degrees of honours with great travel and long time, which quencheth always envy, except it be joined with extreme malice. But, in the mean time, they do his Lordship much honour; for the more despitefully they inveigh against his Lordship, the more reason hath her Majesty to trust him, and the realm to honour him."

surer's life, but in depreciating his origin and family, in a style the most puerile and foolish. As to the reflections cast on Lord Burghley, for his conduct under Edward VI. and Mary, we must refer to the account we have given of him in our First Volume, and to which we paid all the attention we could, having these calumnies, though of so much lower a date, even then before our eyes; nor were we careless in looking to the history of his Lordship's family, considering what we knew to have been said upon that subject, in the libels of which we are speaking, but which could not, with propriety, have been distinctly treated of in that state of our inquiries. Referring the reader, then, to the first chapter of our first volume, for what we conceive to be a true and authentic account of the family, as admitted by heralds and genealogists of known credit, reputation, and authority, we shall so far notice the calumnious reports of the adverse party, as to shew, that we do not wish to slur them over, as though we had never seen them, nor yet to suppress them, as though we judged them to be at all founded on facts.

Admitting, then, the provocation alluded to,* of some injurious reflections on the births of Allen and Persons, we should still be disposed to smile only at their uncourteous retort in the invectives of Philopatris, if other reasons did not induce us to notice the slanders.

But first we must observe, that the Papists were trying at this time to persuade the world, with a design, no doubt, of alarming the King of Scotland, that Lord Burghley had it in view to marry his grandson to the Lady Arabella,† of the House of Lennox, whose claims to the crown might afterwards be brought forward.‡ Hence it was assumed by Philopatris, that Lord Burghley was anxious to make it appear that through the Sitsilts he was allied to the ancient Princes of Wales, though he had before that endeavoured to trace his name of Cecil to the Roman Cecilii; "whereof there were," says this author, "many, especially that famous man, Cecilius Claudius, of whose great wealth Pliny writes," and whom he supposes the Treasurer wished most to resemble.

* One of the principal provocations that set Philopatris to work, was the Queen's severe proclamation against Jesuits and Seminaries, before mentioned.

† In a letter from Mr. Standen, at Madrid, to Mr. Bacon (Birch's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 84. ann. 1591), he writes, "There is a report runneth in the Court of Spain also, of the pretended wedlock between his Honour's (Lord Burghley's) little son and dame Arabella, which giveth content to my Lord's enemies, for the reckoning they make thereby of the ruin of himself and his house." Great projects were on foot, at this time, to get the Lady Arabella out of England, and convey her to Spain, as one that might interfere with Philip's views on the English Crown.

‡ Bacon notices this among the manifest untruths dispersed through the libel; he calls it "a mere imagination, without any circumstance at all to induce it." And he adds, "These men are grown to a singular spirit and faculty in lying and abusing the world; such as, it seemeth, although they are to purchase a particular dispensation for all other sins, yet, they have a dispensation dormant to lie for the Catholic cause."

All this is humorous enough, and we have answered it before; but he afterwards falls into a course of questions more intended to insinuate what he knew to be false, than in any manner to establish facts, as how David Cecil, Lord Burghley's grandfather, came to keep an inn at Stamford? whereas, it is indisputable that his grandfather possessed a fair estate in Lincolnshire, in the time of Henry VII., served the office of Sheriff for the County of Northampton,* and, instead of keeping an inn at Stamford, actually founded a Chauntry there. He asks, how the father of Lord Burghley (whom he falsely calls David Cecil) should only have been Groom of the Wardrobe, and but a plain and mean man, his mother not even venturing to call herself Mistress, till "after her sonne was Barron of Burley?"

How respectable a person his father (Richard Cecil) was in the Court of King Henry VIII., who gave him many Stewardships, besides his appointments in the Wardrobe, we have shewn; and as to his mother not allowing herself to be called Mrs. till after her son became "Barron of Burley," if it were so, it was certainly a great mark of modesty and humility in that good and charitable Lady (for so she was, as every body now knows), since she was actually by birth and descent, heiress of that very estate of "Burley," or Burghley, from whence her son afterwards took his title.

But we have not done with these questions as to the poverty of Lord Burghley's immediate ancestors. "How came it," it is afterwards asked, "that my Lord Treasurer himself is said to have been first of all only a bell-ringer in St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterwards grew, by learning and cunning, and by the help and favour of Sir John Cheeke and Sir Anthony Cooke, to be Secretary to the Duke of Somerset, that was Protector," &c.

Were this in any part true, it could scarcely be discreditable. A mere bell-ringer of a college to recommend himself so by his learning (we will leave out cunning, for without learning the latter could never have raised him so high), to two of the most eminent persons of his time, as not only to be made Secretary to a Protector of England through their means, but to be allowed to marry the sister of one of those learned and distinguished Knights, and the daughter of the other; and not only allowed to enter their families, but, in the latter instance, chosen by one of the most careful fathers that daughters ever had, to marry one of the most accomplished daughters that father ever had.*

But, to recover, if possible, the actual and true story, we know, that if it really ever were said (which we doubt), that first of all the Lord Treasurer was only a bell-ringer in St. John's, it has also been said, and believed by those who knew him well, that when he "first of all" went as a student to St. John's College, so great was his thirst after knowledge, and desire of improvement, and anxiety to make the most of his time, that he was accustomed to hire the college bell-ringer to "call him up at four of the clock every morning; with which watching and continual sitting, he laid the foundation for the gout, which harassed him all his life after," and which, had he actually been a bell-ringer, he probably would have escaped.

But one would think that this fiction of his having been a bell-ringer, was a mere copy of what had happened before to Cranmer, who, when he married his first wife, being then reader of Buckingham College, and having put his wife to board at one of the Inns at Cambridge, was represented by some priests to have been originally an hostler, and his wife the tapster; so that when he became Archbishop, and this story was revived against him, he was judged to have no more learning than hostlers are wont to have; and to one who had praised him for his talents before a Catholic Priest, "What," said the latter, "make ye so much of him? he was but an hostler, and hath as much learning as the goslings of the green that go yonder." The story is admirably told by Strype,† who adds a very amusing account of the good-humoured manner in which the Archbishop wiped away the reproach, by offering to undergo an examination by the Priest, to determine which were the greater goose of the two? But to return to Lord Burghley. Having briefly noted the slur cast upon his family, we shall the better understand the following sarcasms upon his armorial bearings.

The crest of the Marquess of Exeter, Baron Burghley, is at this day, in proper heraldic terms, "On a chapeau, gules, turned up with ermine; a garb, or, supported by two lions, one argent, and the other azure;" but Philopatris would have it that the two lions were originally two horses, till changed to lions, " to terrify the world withal, and to liken himself thereby to Princes, that have commonly lions in their arms." He took also six lions into his shield, and two for supporters, as may be seen to this day in the arms of his noble descendants. But from what follows, we may judge of the whole drift of the sarcasm;—" Instead of princely lions," says this facetious writer, " a good fat capon or roasted pig seemeth a fitter cognizance for an innholder's grandchild, seeing that those things (and he might surely have added his two horses) are more commonly to be found in *Inns and Ostelries than lions."

We should certainly have not dwelt so long on this absurd story, had we not met with it in manuscripts of those times, in more than one public library of the kingdom, and did we not feel and know, that it is not every inquirer, who, upon the discovery of such papers, would give himself the trouble of investigating the real truth; in the case of such great families, besides, there are always some petty piques and resentments afloat, prompting to the revival and circulation of any ancient calumnies; instances of this might be produced with ease, in regard to the very family of which we are writing. We have already, in our first volume, cited a letter of the first Lord Exeter at the beginning of the succeeding century, complaining that his brother, the first Earl of Salisbury, had been slanderously represented to be the grandson of a sieve-maker, and giving directions to have the archives of Burghley searched to prove the contrary. But it is time to turn to other things.

We must not conclude our account of the transactions of this year, without noticing the death of Sir John Perrott, who died in prison, after conviction by a jury, and in consequence of a trial before Commissioners appointed by the Queen, and of whom, to our surprise, Sir Robert Cecil appears to have been one; for it is extremely evident that Lord Burghley (who probably knew his value) would have stayed the proceedings, if he could have done it, and with tears lamented his hard fate;* observing, as it is reported of him, that "hatred, the more unjust it is, so much the more sharp and cruel it is." See also Lodge, iii. pp. 11 and 20. It was his own hasty temper probably that brought him to his end, though Hatton is represented to have been the chief cause of his fall.† He was convicted of having spoken opprobiously of the Queen, and which, indeed, he acknowledged; but allowances should be made for him: he was, probably, the son of the same father, and, as her deputy in Ireland, had supported her authority against the insidious chieftains of that constantly disturbed country, doing all he could to make her distrustful of their insidious professions, but in vain. She listened to her enemies, and distrusted her best friends; and Sir John was made to pay the forfeit of her credulity. This year also terminated the life of one of her Majesty's greatest, but most honourable enemies—the Duke of Parma. Queen Elizabeth, Camden relates, never named him but with great respect and commendations, yet warily, lest her praises might turn to his prejudice. He had governed the Low Countries under Philip, for above thirteen years. His death was sudden—being in the act of mounting his horse after dinner, December 2, 1592, he was seized with an extreme pain, so that he fell from his horse, crying out first, Io sono ingannato, and then, Portatemi l'aqua contra il veneno. It was brought to him and administered, but in vain; he never spoke afterwards. His death, however, is attributed by the editors of the Dictionnaire Historique, not to poison, but to a wound he received before Rouen—he was only forty-six years of age; being the son of a natural daughter of the Emperor Charles V.

* It deserves to be noticed, that had the grandfather of Lord Burghley been actually an Inn-holder, it betokened nothing mean, for the town residences of the first nobility in those days were called Inns. Thus, a magnificent house of Sir John Poulteney, who had been four times Lord Mayor of London, was called Poulteney Inn, and did not lose its name when it became the house or inn of Langley, Earl of Cambridge. Warwick Inn was the palace of the great Earl of Warwick, called the King-maker.—See Pennant's London, iv. 233. We may add, that Henry IV. in a grant of a house to his son, the Prince of Wales, styled it " quoddam hospitium." Lincoln's Inn was the name of a house of Lacy, Earl of Lincoln.

We shall have little more to do in our account of this year, than to notice the proceedings of the Parliament, which was summoned to meet on the 19th of February, 1592-3, and which, as usual, has led some to call it the Parliament of 1592, and others of 1593; but as to the date of the Queen's reign, there can be no doubt; it may, therefore, most correctly be called the Parliament of the 35th of Elizabeth; according to the common date of the statutes then passed, and the laws promulgated, and the eighth parliament holden in her reign.

It may be concluded, that, like all the Parliaments of those days, it was called together, principally, to grant an aid to her Majesty, and, in order to procure this to be cordially entered upon, an official statement of the real circumstances, wants, and dangers of the nation required to be set forth. The first speech to this effect, was the speech of the Lord Keeper Puckering, who had been appointed by her Majesty to succeed Sir Christopher Hatton, in that high office, and the principal points of whose speech may be thus exemplified:—that the great malice of the King of Spain towards the realm of England was in no manner abated; that having discovered the error of sending such high and mighty ships, as his Armada consisted of, into the narrow seas, he was now building ships of a less bulk, for the purposes of invasion, and occupying different towns in Brittany (Bretagne), to facilitate his operations; and that, in order to make a "stepping stone" of Scotland, he had, by great sums, brought many of the Nobility there to join in the conspiracy against England; and that the defence of England, therefore, from so many foes, requiring great expenses, her Majesty could not but wish to have the advice and assistance of her faithful Parliament.

We have called this the Lord Keeper's speech, for so it is reported in the Journals and Parliamentary Histories; but from a paper drawn up by Lord Burghley, and which Strype has printed, [Annals, iv. No. lxxx.] he appears to have received his instructions immediately from the Lord Treasurer; and, indeed, how much it depended on that noble Lord to represent to both Houses of Parliament the exact state of the nation, as to foreign dangers, may be judged, not only from the above circumstance of his having furnished the Lord Keeper with instructions in several distinct articles, but from his opening the debate upon the supplies in the Upper House, while his son, Sir Robert Cecil, was employed in the same manner in the Lower House of Parliament. The speech of the latter may be seen in D'Ewes, in Cobbett's Parliamentary History, and other books. Lord Burghley's speech may also be seen in the latter, and in the fourth volume of Strype's Annals, No. lxvi.; as appertaining, however, so much to these Memoirs, we cannot omit to cite some passages of it, as proofs of his continual vigilance, and care of the kingdom; besides that it may be said to contain a summary account of the chief difficulties of this reign, and, consequently, of Lord Burghley's long administration. It begins thus: "To make a declaration of the first cause and original beginning, whereby her Majesty was provoked to arm her realms with forces, were a labour lost in this place, where in former times the same hath been often declared; and wherein a great number of the Nobility here present have heard many circumstances thereof at the proceeding with the late Queen of Scots; for whom, and by whom, the quarrels were first made against the Queen's Majesty's person, and against the religion and quietness of the realm.

"And, therefore, leaving the repetition of that cause, by which her Majesty was detained in a kind of war, to withstand both the Kings of France and Spain, who intermeddled in the case of the Queen of Scots against her Majesty; yet there hath followed continually such a deadly malice from the King of Spain, the Bishop of Rome, and their confederates, as unto this day, wherein no intermission hath been of attempts against her Majesty and the realm, although at some times more vehement than at others; as appeared in the year eighty-eight, by his open armies both by sea and land; being of greater force than ever was made by his father, the Emperor Charles, or by himself, or by any Christian Prince, within memory of man.

"But minding to overpass all the attempts before that great enterprize, and considering there hath been no assembly of Parliament since that time, wherein her Majesty might justly declare to the States of her realm not only the continuance of the former attempts, but the increase of more dangers than were seen in any time before; therefore, as was delivered by the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, her Majesty hath summarily imparted the same to this Assembly, referring the consideration thereof to the whole three Estates, whereof two are in this place, how the same danger may be withstood, and by what provision her Majesty and realm may be preserved in domestic peace, as yet it is, as in a centre of happiness, where the circumference is in open calamity.

"Wherefore, in the discharge of my duty, with your patience in suffering an old man, besides his years, decayed in his spirits with sickness, to declare some part of his knowledge of the dangers and perils imminent: but for advice and council how to withstand the same, I shall be constrained, for want of sufficient understanding in so great a cause, to require some further conference with your Lordships.

"As to the dangers, that they be great and imminent, that they have both lately grown, and are likely to increase, there be manifest argument. First, the King of Spain, since he hath usurped upon the kingdom of Portugal, he hath thereby grown mighty, by gaining the East Indies. So as how great soever he was before, he is now thereby more manifestly great; but for increase hereof to be greater, yea greater than any Christian Prince hath been, he hath lately joined with his intended purpose newly to invade this realm with more might than before he did the invasion of France by sundry ways. Not, as in former times, when the Emperor Charles and the French Kings, the great Francis and the warlike Henry, made former wars for towns their greatest wars; yea, when the present King of Spain had his great army against Henry of France: for, in those wars, none of them intended any more but to be revenged of supposed injuries, by burning or winning some frontier towns; and, after such revenges, they fell to truces; and, in the end, with knots sometimes of intermarriages; and in these kind of wars none of them did increase in greatness to be dangerous to their enemies; and in these kinds of wars our Kings of England had their interest for the most part to the expense indeed of men and money, but never to the loss of any small portion of any ground in England and Wales, nor otherwise, but by yielding to the King of Spain, by means of the marriage of Queen Mary, to make war with France, the realm lost that noble town and port of Calais, with great seignories and territories thereto belonging.

" But now the case is altered. The King of Spain maketh these his mighty wars by the means only of his Indies, not purposely to burn a town in France or England, but to conquer all France, all England and Ireland; and for proof hereof, first, for France, he hath invaded Britain [Bretagne], taken the fort, builded his fortresses, and carried his army; waged (taken into pay) a navy, and a great number of his subjects as rebels to France; and there he keepeth a navy armed, to impeach all trade of merchandise from England to Gascoigne and Guienne, which he attempted to do this last vintage, so as now he is become as a frontier enemy to all the west of England, as well as all the south parts, as Sussex, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight. Yea, by means of his interest in St. Malos, a port full of shipping for the war, he is a dangerous neighbour to the Queen's isles of Jersey and Guernsey, ancient possessions of this crown, and never conquered in the greatest wars with France."

His Lordship next descanted largely upon his [the King of Spain's] designs against France; shewing, not only that he had, by corruption and bribery, procured a rebellion against the King, all the Princes of the blood, and great officers of the crown, but that he had, at great expense, levied and sent into France, armies of Walloons, Lorrainers, Italians, Spaniards, Almains, and Switzers; had caused his son-in-law, the Duke of Savoy, to invade France, by Provence and Dauphine, and the Duke of Lorrain, by Burgundy and Champaigne; intending to be King of that realm, or to make his daughter the Queen, and to appoint her a husband to be as his vassal. And he adds, " He hath also the Pope so addicted to him, as he that never was wont to send to any parts, only of Italy, but by bulls with lead and parchment, did now levy and send an army into France."

The speech proceeds to set forth the certain proofs of the King of Spain's fresh designs upon England, as his preparation of ships more suited to the narrow seas, as insisted upon in the Lord Keeper's speech; and his tampering with the Hollanders, England's "faint and covetous neighbours," as his Lordship called them, for a supply of naval stores, gathering from them, to use his own words, "with silver hooks, mariners, ships, cordage, and provisions."

He next observes, "How he and the Pope ply themselves to win a party in England to be ready to second his invasion, I am sorry and loth to relate: and how far they have prevailed herein, to gain so great a multitude of the common people; yea, of some that are of wealth and countenance, with vain hopes to attain to the places, honours, and livelihoods of such as are now known to be true natural Englishmen, and good subjects."

He next proceeds to notice what has been already said of the conspiracy in Scotland, to admit the Spanish forces and invade England, but concludes with assuring them of his good hopes, that the King of Scotland was aware of the stratagem, and would pursue the conspirators to their defeat and ruin.

All that the Lord Treasurer advanced in the Upper House, was corroborated by his son, Sir Robert Cecil, in the Commons, on Monday the 26th day of February. He began his speech with observing, that he had been a Member of the House in five successive Parliaments, and, as his words imply, had never before attempted any thing farther, than to express his consent or dissent, by an aye or a no. He noticed the magnanimity, zeal, and judgment of the Queen, in abolishing, at her succession, the authority of Rome. Magnanimity, in undertaking so great an enterprise; zeal, in professing the same, not for show, but of sincerity; judgment, in defending it and preventing all the designs of its enemies. The rest of his speech was but an echo to that of his father, to which, however, we must advert once more, in order to call the reader's attention to a particular passage in it. Lord Burghley, it will have been seen, speaks of the realm, as "a centre of peace and happiness, where the circumference is in open calamity." This is a remarkable expression, and leads us to the reflection, that all the troubles of England seemed to flow in upon it from he circumference; and to be owing, not so much to any want of order or settled government at home, as to the disturbed state of other countries. There can be no possible doubt of a design constantly on foot, from the first moment of Elizabeth's determination in favour of the Protestant religion, to procure the restoration of the Romish religion, though it should be to the overthrow of Elizabeth herself, and the consequent transfer of her crown to a Popish successor; but this was all from the circumference—from France, Spain, Rome, Scotland, and the Low Countries, with the foreign Seminaries. So well did Elizabeth and her Catholic subjects agree at first, that she was judged, from her lenity, to be a Papist herself; and though there were intrigues going forward, to the purposes abovementioned, they were little formidable till Mary came into the kingdom, the known and avowed competitor of Elizabeth. This may be said to have been a formidable pressure of the circumference upon the centre, for it was impossible, considering the situation in which Elizabeth had been placed by the Pope's bull, not to be suspicious of the near approach of such a competitor, backed, as she was known to be, by some of the most powerful votaries and obedient sons of the See of Rome. It must have been evident, that to keep things quiet in the centre, with so agitated a circumference of many nations, would require a degree of vigilance, more strict than before, and only to be justified by circumstances undoubtedly known to the Government. We may even add, that the disturbances in the Church are to be referred to the circumference. The centre might have been quiet enough, under the established laws, had not the Geneva Platform got such possession of some men's minds, as to be brought forward, not merely as a standard of Non-conformity, but in very rude contempt of all Episcopal authority, however supported by the laws. See Life of Whitgift, b. iv. ch. x. And though the Star-chamber and the High Commission were, indeed, such Courts, as we should not wish to be thought to defend, because we could certainly never wish to see them revived, yet we have not the smallest doubt, but that the principles of those with whom the State and the Church in those days had to contend, were to the full as intolerant, if, indeed, not much more so. But to return for the present to the question of aid.

Sir John Fortescue, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Sir Walter Mildmay, dwelt largely, as his office led him to do, on her Majesty's great but necessary expenses, as well as on her care of the public revenue.

"Her Majesty," he observed, "has not only been careful for the preservation of her own realm, but of her neighbours' also; she hath not only defended her own subjects from being invaded, but also hath aided strangers which wanted money, with whom otherwise it would have gone ill by this time, both with them and ourselves; insomuch that the burden of four kingdoms hath rested upon her Majesty, which she hath maintained with her purse*—England, France, Ireland, and Scotland; for how could the French King, at his first coming to the crown, have held out against those leaguers, had not her Majesty assisted him with her men and money, which had cost her Majesty about a hundred thousand pounds; for it is well known that the French King had not been able to withstand the Duke of Parma's coming into France, had it not been for our Englishmen and money. As for the Low Countries, they have stood her Majesty in yearly, since she undertook the defence of them, one hundred and fifty thousand pounds; all which her Majesty bestowed for the good of the realm, to free us from war at home.

"Besides, when her Majesty came to the crown, she found it four millions indebted; her navy, when she came to view it, she found greatly decayed; yet all this hath she discharged, and (thanks be to God) is nothing indebted; and now she is able to match any Prince in Europe, which the Spaniards found when they came to invade us. Yea, she hath, with her ships, compassed the whole world, whereby this land is made famous throughout all places. She did find in her navy all iron pieces, but she has furnished it with artillery of brass, so that one of her ships is not a subject's, but a petty king's wealth. As for her own private expenses, they have been little in building; she hath consumed little or nothing in her pleasures; as for her apparel, it is royal and princely, beseeming her calling, but not sumptuous or excessive; the charges of her house small, yea, never less in any King's time; and shortly (by God's grace), she will free her subjects from that trouble which hath come by means of purveyors. The subsidies which are granted now-a-days to her Majesty, are less by half than they were in King Henry the Eighth's time; and though her Majesty hath borrowed some money of her subjects besides her subsidies, yet she hath truly repaid and answered every one fully."†

* In Fuller's Holy State, speaking of Lord Burghley, the following passage is much to the purpose: "The best demonstration of his (Lord Burghley's) care in stewarding her treasure was this, that the Queen vying gold and silver with the King of Spain, had money or credit, when the other had neither; her Exchequer, though but a pond in comparison, holding water, when his river, fed with a spring from the Indies, was drained dry."

† This deserves to be noticed, because her love of money has led many to suppose that she was quite careless how she obtained it, provided she could have it when wanted. In Mr. Pennant's History of London, there is a sneer upon her to this effect, which she did not deserve. Speaking

In a debate afterwards on the subsidy, another Member of the House, Sir William Moore, gave equal credit to her Majesty for her punctuality in discharging debts. "Her Majesty," he said, "had more cause to have the subsidy than had Henry VIII., Edward VI., or Queen Mary; for Henry VIII., his wars continued not, though they were violent for the time. His wars were impulsive, and not defensive; he had the suppression of all the Abbeys, a matter of great riches unto him; he had a benevolence, and then a subsidy, paid within three months. Edward VI. had chantries, and all the church plate for relief paid him. Queen Mary had a relief paid her, which she never repaid; but her Majesty that now is, hath been a continual defence of her own realm and her neighbours' kingdoms, England, Ireland, France, and the Low Countries; yet hath she repaid the loans, and had not such helps."

Another member, Sir George Carey, speaking of the dangers impending and intended in the summer, asserted, as of his own knowledge, that the King of Spain had already sent seven thousand pistolets of gold into Scotland to corrupt the Nobility; and to the King, 20,000 crowns were lately dispatched out of France into Scotland for the levying of 3000, which the Scottish Lords had promised; and the King of Spain was to levy 30,000 more, and give them all pay.

Sir Walter Raleigh dwelt largely on the known malice and great power of the King of Spain, and proposed the attacking him in Bretagne, and expelling his forces from that province.

It will be seen from the above speech, what a desire was manifested by certain persons for an offensive war, which soon led to enterprises which we shall have occasion more particularly to notice.

The Parliament, after considerable debating, and some hindrance upon a question of privileges between the Upper and Lower House, agreed to a treble subsidy, with six fifteenths and tenths, payable in four years; while the Clergy in Convocation taxed themselves at two entire subsidies.

Another question for a long time occupied the attention of the Commons; namely, the Bill against Recusants; not Popish Recusants only, but others.

of the Goldsmith's Company, he observes, "Queen Elizabeth presented this Company with a silver cup, out of which annual libations are made to her memory. She was particularly kind to the citizens, and borrowed money of them on all occasions. The goldsmiths must of course enjoy a distinguished place in her esteem." The History of London would not have been the worse had this passage been omitted. We are sorry to say we have met with many such in the work alluded to.

It would seem, that the Queen and the Archbishop, and the friends to uniformity,* were wearied out with the attempts of the Puritans to force the Genevan platform upon the country, in contempt of the Queen's prerogative, and the government of the Church by Bishops, according to law.† The term Recusants, as applied to this sect, was something beyond non-conformity; it implied an absolute rejection of the government by Bishops, and consequently an opposition to the laws. In the very preamble of the Bill, therefore, the Recusants were generally designated as disloyal subjects, who were to be reduced to compliance by severe penalties, or sent out of the kingdom as disturbers. The case was one of extreme difficulty. The Queen and the majority

* As many writers, especially among the Presbyterians, have been willing to rank Lord Burghley amongst the decided friends of Puritanism, led thereto, no doubt, by his frequent communications with the party, and friendly interposition to save individuals from severe punishment, we cannot help observing, that he was looked up to by the other party as a strict maintainer of the laws, and a friend to the establishment; in proof of which we shall copy the following letter of that great and good man Richard Hooker, who, at the beginning of this year, sent to the Lord Treasurer, for his inspection, the written copy of his admirable work on Ecclesiastical Polity; the first four books of which were soon afterwards published. It should be remembered, that in the contest between Hooker and Travers, the latter had the support of Lord Burghley, on account of his learning. The following is Hooker's letter:—

"My duty in most humble manner remembered—So it is, my good Lord, that many times affection causeth those things to be done, which would rather be forborne, if men were wholly guided by judgment. Albeit, therefore, I must needs in reason condemn myself of over-great boldness, for thus presuming to offer to your Lordship's view my poor and slender labours; yet, because that which moves me so to do, is a dutiful affection some way to manifest itself: and glad to take this present occasion, for want of other more worthy your Lordship's acceptation: I am in that behalf not out of hope, your Lordship's wisdom will the easier pardon my fault, the rather, because myself am persuaded, that my faultiness had been greater, if these writings concerning the nobler part of those laws under which we live, should not have craved with the first your Lordship's approbation, whose painful care to uphold all laws, and especially the ecclesiastical, hath by the space of so many years so apparently shewed itself, that if we, who enjoy the benefit thereof, did dissemble it, they whose malice doth most envy our good herein, would convince our unthankfulness. Wherefore, submitting both myself, and these my simple doings unto your Lordship's most wise judgment, I here humbly take my leave.—London, the xiii. March, 1592-3.

"Your Lordship's most willingly at commandment,

"Richard Hooker."

† If there can be any doubt of this, the reader may consult the Xth chapter of the IVth book of Strype's Life of Whitgift, where may be seen that Primate's letter to Beza upon the subject, and a good account of Bancroft's Survey of the pretended Discipline, which came forth this year. See also his Annals of the Reformation, vol. iv. No. xciii.

of her Council were reformers; but the Puritans were ultra-reformists, so little satisfied with what had been done, in discarding popery, that they were for discarding much, that in the separation from the Church of Rome had not been discarded here by any authority. Which, we may ask, might be expected to yield? those who had the law on their side, or those who had the law against them? We should decidedly say the latter; not to any compromise against conscience on any point of religion strictly so called, but certainly on points of Church Government, Rites, and Ceremonies.* But there was no yielding on either side, and as the laws gave power, those who openly oppugned the laws, which the Puritans, in many glaring instances, certainly did, naturally laid themselves open to very sharp restraints, and we wish we could avoid saying, pains and penalties. Many, no doubt, suffered severely,† and those who

* See a most able paper, attributed to the Lord Keeper Puckering, on the tenets of the Puritans, Strype's Annals, iv. No. xciv. See also Bacon's observations on the libel noticed under the preceding year; "It is true," says he, "that certain men, moved with an inconsiderate detestation of all ceremonies or orders which were in use in the time of the Roman religion, as if they were without difference, superstitious, or polluted, and led with an affectionate imitation of the government of some Protestant Churches in foreign states, have sought, by books and preaching, indiscreetly, and sometimes undutifully, to bring in an alteration in the external rites and policy of the Church."

† In this year, Penry, the reputed Author of the work or works that passed under the name of Martin Marprelate, was taken and hung, for speaking and writing slanderous things of her Majesty; and it was certainly melancholy to think, that he could not discover that he was slandering her, or that he would be understood to do so, when he called her an enemy and opposer of the Gospel; adding, that those were but sycophants and flatterers that told her otherwise. But his case was a melancholy one, as the case of an infatuated young man, perfectly led away by the zealots of the day.—See his indictment, with expressions taken out of his printed books, Strype's Annals, iv. No. cxvi., from Lord Keeper Puckering's papers. The following paper also, No. cxvii., will shew, how much mistaken he must have been, in fancying that he could pass for a loyal subject, while he was continually railing in the foulest terms against, not only the whole ecclesiastical Government established by her Majesty, but against her own executive Government, in pretending that she had no right to restrain those who vilified the laws, and were for setting up a discipline of their own, in defiance of her authority.

He addressed, just before his death, a very long protestation of his innocent intentions to the Lord Treasurer; having, in a letter from prison, previously thus expressed his sense of that Lord's goodness to him: "Being likely to trouble your Lordship with no more letters, I do with thankfulness acknowledge your Honour's favour towards me, in that you have been always open to receive the writings which I have presumed to send unto you from time to time." A pestilence having this year afflicted London, the followers attributed it to the cruel death to which he did so, found an able advocate in this Parliament, in the person of Mr. James Morrice, attorney of the Court of Wards;* who, on the 27th of February, "moved the House touching the hard courses of the Bishops and Ordinaries, and other Ecclesiastical Judges in their courts, used towards sundry learned and godly Ministers and Preachers, by way of inquisition, subscription, and binding absolution, contrary (he said) to the honour of God, the regality of her Majesty, the laws of the realm, and the liberty of the subject." We shall not attempt to dispute the purity of Mr. Morrice's motives, nor the displeasure he expresses at the severity of Courts, happily unknown in our days, much less, the epithets he bestows on the persons restrained, of "learned and godly;" they might be so, and yet give much trouble to the ruling powers. The Queen, besides being a great upholder of her own Ecclesiastical Supremacy, was for referring all such questions, rather to the Ecclesiastical, than to the Lay Assembly of Legislators; to the Convocation, in short, rather than to the Parliament; with which latter, on such and other occasions, she often, indeed, interfered to the fullest extent of her presumed, if not indeed generally acknowledged, prerogative.† She therefore prohibited such discussions in the House of Commons, and Mr. Morrice himself was actually sent to prison for the boldness of his attempt;

(Penry) was brought; but Camden, to the Planet Saturn's passing through the uttermost parts of Cancer, and the beginning of Leo!!—477. Whether it were the unfortunate executions, or the unfriendly aspect and course of the planets, which so disordered the elements, certain it is, that the times seem to have been very bad, since Dr. King, in his lectures at York, 1593, 1594, introduces the following remark: "We may say, the course of nature is very much inverted. Our years are turned upside down: our summers are no summers: our harvests are no harvests: our seed-times are no seed-times. For a great space of time, scant any day hath been seen that it hath not rained upon us, and the nights are like the days." Nothing could be more applicable to the season in which this part of our work was written; the summers of 1828, 1829, corresponded in a remarkable manner with those described by Dr. King, to the great hurt, and almost ruin, of farmers.

* Member for Colchester. See an account of him, Lodge's Illustrations of History, iii. 36.—In Aikin's History of the Court of Queen Elizabeth, he is called Chancellor of the Duchy.

† To explain these terms, we must refer to Hume's third Appendix on the Government of England, &c., in which he argues, from the known popularity of Elizabeth, that though she acted upon the highest notions of the kingly authority and prerogative, the people did not seem to be at all sensible, that she was infringing their established liberties. They were submissive upon principle, thereby encouraging the Sovereign to be more imperious than might otherwise have been the case. Sir Edward Coke used to call the Prerogative the "Great Monster," which few dared attack.

the House being thereby thrown into considerable confusion. Sir Robert Cecil made no scruple to say, "The man that offered this motion is learned and wise, and one whom I love; yet a bill to be offered and enforced in this sort, being of such effect, I know not how to allow of it." In the mean while, he assured the House that her Majesty contemplated some redress; and indeed it ought to be observed, that she was not inattentive to the principal subject of Mr. Morrice's complaints, but gave the Bishops public and rather sharp warnings to look to the abuses of their Courts and Offices. A regular commission, indeed, was directed to the Archbishop, to institute formal inquiries to that effect, and Commissioners appointed accordingly; [see Life of Whitgift, book iv. ch. xii.] so that Mr. Morrice's offence seems to have been, his having made his remonstrances in a wrong place, and sought to accomplish by the Parliament, what the Queen judged to belong entirely to herself, and the spiritual rulers of the Established Church.

On the 1st of March, 1592-3, Mr. Morrice, being still under restraint, wrote a long letter to Lord Burghley, which may be seen in Lodge's Illustrations of History, vol. iii. p. 34, in which letter he complains greatly of the tyranny of the Clergy, of which we have before spoken. The beginning of Mr. Morrice's letter plainly shews, that in the midst of such warm proceedings, Lord Burghley and Sir Robert Cecil were accounted the friends rather than the foes of those who were most rigorously dealt with. Mr. Morrice, indeed, was an Officer of his own Court of Wards. His letter runs thus:

"Right Honourable, my very good Lord,

"That I am no more hardly handled I impute, next unto God, to your honourable good-will and favour; for although I am assured that the cause I took in hand is good and honest, yet I believe that besides your Lordship, and that honourable person your son, I have never an honest friend; but no marvel."* He does not appear to have been long under restraint, for in October of this year, he was recommended by Lord Essex to the Queen, for the office of Attorney-general, but rejected, though without any denial of his talents and qualifications. The author of the Court of Elizabeth questions whether he ever recovered his liberty.

It would be painful for us to go further into the history of the severities complained of at this time, as we could scarcely expect to account for them to the satisfaction of readers in general. It will always be thought by some, that both Papists and Puritans were hardly dealt with, and that the penalties enacted against recusants and non-conformists were very much too severe; but it deserves to be considered, that the weight of these punishments fell chiefly, if not entirely, on those who were attached to foreign principles, and abetted by those at a distance, who had really no right to dictate to the rulers of England; the Seminary Priests were certainly such, and their presence here, on that account, obnoxious even to those of their own religion, who saw into their purposes; nor can there be any doubt but that the most zealous and busy among the Puritans, were stimulated and encouraged by the writings, if not the discourses, of the anti-episcopalians of Switzerland and Scotland; and, as Bancroft wrote in the course of this very year (in respect of foreigners interposing themselves in our English Church's affairs), "it was great presumption for any ministers of any of the reformed Churches, to take upon them to censure or direct the practice of this Church of England, reformed by men of as much or more learning and ability than themselves;"—mentioning particularly Calvin and Beza; "under whose wings," as Strype says, "the new reformers (or rather ultra reformers) here did shroud themselves;" concerning Calvin he took notice, that when Knox and Whittingham sent to him from Frankfort the English Liturgy, put into Latin, to peruse, he gave his judgment of it in these words, that therein he saw many trifles, yet that might be borne with. Whereas it had been compiled and confirmed before by such men and such authority as Calvin ought to have reverenced. And although Beza thought this epistle of Calvin fit to be published, yet he (Bancroft) found not one point of substance in it, to persuade a child. Beza was certainly the most forward of all the Swiss divines, in forcing the platform upon other Churches and congregations, and in other countries; and by far the least tolerant of Episcopal government; but he had decidedly no right to interfere with England, and though an eminent man in his way, and in his own country, neither his aid nor his advice were really wanted in England, as Archbishop Whitgift, with as much civility and moderation as could be expected of him, considering all things, had occasion to remind him.

We have dwelt rather largely upon this, because Rapin, who, for want of other more impartial historians, is still much relied upon (and indeed, often deservedly so), but who had certainly no tender regard either for monarchy or episcopacy, does not seem to us to represent the case correctly. He throws the whole blame of intolerance on the Bishops and Clergy, forgetting that they were actually contending for toleration in favour of themselves, having the law on their side; but neither the Papists nor the Puritans would acknowledge their authority; nothing but the Romish religion restored, or the platform allowed to take the place of the established liturgy and Church government, could serve to satisfy those who were opposed to the Bishops and Clergy: this, we think, is the truest state of the case. Rapin thinks it to have been an intolerable hardship that they should be expected to repair to some Church weekly, in proof of conformity: truly we should think the same, if we did not happen to know that for ten years of the Queen's reign, the reformed liturgy was judged to have been rendered so inoffensive to the Romanists, that many attended the Churches without scruple; and with regard to the Puritans, that that good and moderate Swiss Pastor Bullinger, had acknowledged that the Reformation under Edward VI., if restored, would satisfy him, and others around him, sufficiently; the objections therefore to Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity were, generally speaking, efforts to overset the establishment. In a letter, indeed, addressed to Lord Burghley from the Clink, by one of the imprisoned pastors, Francis Johnson, he complains of being punished for refusing to have spiritual communion with the antichristian Prelacy and other Clergy abiding in the land; and sues to have a conference, though ready to shed his blood in the cause, "to the end that the truth being found out and made manifest, the false offices, callings, and works of the Prelacy and other Clergy of this land, might be quite abolished out of it, and their lordships and possessions converted to her Majesty's civil uses." Surely in these expressions we must discern an opposition to the laws, and a very intolerant spirit towards those who differed in opinion from himself; and yet the writer, in a paper inclosed in the same letter, argued that he "fell not under the danger of the statute of 35th Elizabeth, made to retain the Queen's subjects in their due obedience." We cannot forbear copying one passage from this paper, to shew upon what foreign principles these persons were proceeding, and how reasonable it was, either to send them out of the country to have communion with a ministry of their own choice, or restrain them from reviling and disturbing the established ministry, if they continued here. "5. If this statute," Mr. Johnson argues, "of 35 Elizabeth, be against such writings and books as reprove the ecclesiastical ministry and government of Archbishops, Bishops, Archdeacons, Deans, &c., then the writing and printing of the public confessions of the reformed Churches of Helvetia, Tigur, Geneva, Shaffhouse, &c., wherein they write, that as touching Arch-prelates, Metropolitans, Arch-priests, Deans, Sub-deans, and all that rabble, they pass not a rush; and the public confessions of the reformed French and Belgic Churches, which write, that the Church ought to be governed by that regiment or discipline which Christ hath appointed; to wit, so that there be in it, Pastors, Elders, and Deacons." This is certainly not only begging the question, but denying to England all right to judge for herself; placing her in point of learning, judgment, and decision, below all the foreign reformed Churches that chose to follow Calvin and Beza, learned men certainly, and able theologians, but not such as to entitle them to any universal or general submission.—To speak for ourselves, we should still say, on some points, quite the contrary.

It was in this year, July 25, N. S. that Henry IV. of France, to use the apt but sneering expression of Voltaire, " by going to Mass made Philip II. lose the crown of France in a quarter of an hour."* The sneer of the freethinking historian shews the mischief done to true religion by the act of Henry. It was impossible after this, to trust principles against policy. It was a fall on the part of this otherwise amiable, interesting, and brave Monarch, and cannot be regarded in any other light. To say that it was against his will, as he did say, only makes the matter worse, and " after long delay," (another of his excuses,) proves his want of heroic fortitude in so good a cause; and, therefore, we cannot help, in this instance, agreeing with Rapin, and coming to the same conclusion; namely, that " having put his conscience in balance with his crown, he had given it for the latter." Elizabeth had sent an especial envoy to divert him from his purposes, but in vain; and when Morlant, Henry's Embassador in London, had reported to her the King's excuses as delivered to her envoy (Thomas Wilks), she lost no time in writing to the apostate king the following strong letter:—

" It is hardly possible to express the extreme grief and dissatisfaction which has seized me upon Morlant's representation of things. Good God! what a miserable world do we live in! Could I ever have thought, Sir, that any secular consideration could have prevailed with you to discard a just sense of God and

* " Yesterday fifteen days the King sung his first Mass at St. Dennis, accompanied with a multitude of nobility: after which was a solemn procession and invocation to the Virgin, Apostles, and Saints, to pray for him and them—whereunto I can say no more but with Dr. Morison, Vos videritis—and so coupling these and the matters of his country together, I let you to judge of the blazing star's effects." his fear? Or can you ever reasonably expect that Providence will grant this change of yours a happy issue? Or could you entertain a jealousy that the Divine Being, who had so long supported and preserved you, would fail and abandon you at last? It is, believe me, a dangerous experiment, to do evil that good may come; but I hope you may be yet recovered to a better inclination, even the spirit of a sound mind. In the mean time, I shall not cease to recommend your case to God in my daily prayers, and earnestly to beseech him that Esau's hands may not pollute the blessings and birth-right of Jacob. The promise you make of a sacred and friendly alliance, I conceive myself to have deserved, and even earned at a vast expense; but I had not mattered that, had you still kept yourself the son of the same father. From henceforth I cannot look upon myself as your sister, in respect to our common Father, for I must and shall always pay a much greater regard to nature than choice, in that relation. As I may appeal to God, whom I beseech to recover you into the path of a safer and sounder judgment.

"Your sister after the old-fashioned way, as for the new, I have nothing to do with it. "ELIZABETH."*

Camden gives a fuller account than Rapin of the causes assigned by Henry for his conversion; but certainly not more to his credit, except that he complains greatly of being deserted by many of his own party, and that the leaguers took advantage of his being so forsaken.†

Having spoken of this letter of the Queen to the King of France, we must not omit to notice a much longer one which she had occasion to send about the same time to the Emperor of Germany, answering slanderous reports of her; especially that she should stir up the Turk to have war with Christian princes. It may be seen in the 4th vol. of Strype's Annals, No. c., as drawn up and composed by the Lord Treasurer, and written by his secretary, Mr. Maynard,‡

* The original, in French, is in the library of the Duke of Brunswick, among the Mazarin Papers. There is a copy also in the British Museum. Titus C. vii. 61. Mr. Turner's reference is, by mistake, printed 161.

† Camden thinks Elizabeth was seriously hurt by Henry's defection, and that, to ease her mind, she had recourse to the books of Boetius de Consolatione, which she at this time translated. Before the year was out, reports reached England that Henry was so much in the hands of the Papists, and by them so tyrannized and watched, that he could do nothing but think without them. Birch, i. 131.

with an addition in his own hand at the conclusion. It is much too long to transcribe, nor indeed is it necessary, as it corresponds in most points with his Lordship's speech in the House of Lords, but especially as to the wars and projects of the King of Spain ;—not like other wars, to take towns, but to ravage kingdoms, and for the total subversion of countries. It gives a good turn to the troubles of Western Europe, by pointing out to the Emperor, that the Turk (who had just proclaimed a war against the former) would not have dared to do so, had there been peace among the Western Christian princes, which was hindered by the ambition of Spain. What was written in the Lord Treasurer's own hand, was to this effect: "And to shew our Christian disposition to hinder this intended dangerous war, now proceeding from the Turk, whereof cannot but great and inestimable damage happen to Christendom, * which way soever Almighty God shall give the victory ; we have in the zeal that we bear to peace (which is the chiefest blessing of God here on earth), presumed to write and send to the Grand Seignior our letters and message also, to yield to a surcease of war, and there by some colloquy betwixt your Ambassadors to meet on your frontiers, to restore both your states to your former peace." The whole letter is extremely worth reading by those who would wish to know the exact state of Europe, in the year of which we are treating, and may serve to shew how little Lord Burghley's faculties were impaired at this advanced period of his life: similar explanations were also sent to the Czar or Great Duke of Muscovy. It was in the course of this year that Mr. Standen arrived in England from Spain, of whom we have made mention before; he appears to have stood high in the estimation of Lord Essex and the two Bacons, but Lady Bacon was suspicious of him, as she wrote to her son Anthony, June 26, 1593, "Be not," she said, "too frank with that Papist, such have seducing spirits to snare the godly, be not too open." Probably these suspicions were communicated to the Cecils, which drove Standen into the party attached to Essex, who took him up with a Queen's reign, for the Borough of St. Alban's, and afterwards, in the forty-third of her reign, and subsequent to the death of Lord Burghley, for the County of Essex.

* If what we find related in Birch's Memoirs be true, Lord Burghley might well be apprehensive for the fate of Christendom. It is there stated, as a thing credited, that the Turk, having already conquered an extent of 260 miles in Hungary, Croatia, and Carinthia, was making great preparations of war in Thrace, and deliberating, after the example of Attila, to pass Aquileia, ravage Italy, and lay siege to Rome itself. A Diet was actually held to take these threats into consideration, and the Venetians began to fortify the passages through their country.

high hand, Birch i. 124, and by appearing more forward and zealous than the Lord Treasurer, drew upon the latter charges of coldness and reserve towards his near relatives, which, considering the party into which they had thrown themselves, does not appear to have been so great as might have been the case; for Essex, in truth, though a much more amiable man, was, in his opposition to the Cecils, but the follower and representative of his father-in-law Leicester.* In the course of this year there was a competition for the Attorney-General's place; Lord Burghley appears to have been for the removal of Coke, the Solicitor-General, to that post, and to have his nephew Bacon made Solicitor; but Essex was, in his zeal for his young friend, for advancing Bacon before them all, and with a freedom in his communications with the Queen that is very extraordinary, but which strongly marks his character.†—See Birch, i. 125, 126.

The whole history of this negotiation is so circumstantially related by the author just cited, that we need not dwell upon it, except, perhaps, to say that both Essex and Bacon, in their private correspondence, speak with a degree of contempt of their opponents that does them no credit; and as to Bacon, while

* He seems so much to have taken his place in one respect, as to have put things upon a footing of two distinct Governments. Leicester wrote and received dispatches, and gathered information from all quarters jointly with Lord Burghley, but Essex and the Bacons seem to have put themselves in the way of collecting information from all parts, to curry favour with the Queen, rather than at all to assist the Cecils; indeed quite the contrary. In the case of Bodley, Dr. Birch says, he (Essex) took all occasions to divert his attention from the Lord Treasurer, and fix it on himself, i. 206. Essex, besides, seemed to put himself in the way of receiving complaints from those, who thought themselves discountenanced by the Cecils, whatever good reason the latter might have, for not actually advancing or trusting those of his party, before others; nor was he very nice in his choice of persons, from whom he thought he could derive information, as was the case with that strange man Antonio Perez, the discarded Minister of Philip, who came into England for the mere purpose of betraying his late master's secrets, and whom, when on that account the Queen and the Lord Treasurer would not even admit him to their presence, Essex took into his own house, looking upon him as an oracle in regard to the affairs of Spain, and introducing him upon the same footing to the two Bacons, to the great alarm of their mother, who in a letter to the elder of her sons, calls him "a proud, profane, costly fellow; a wretch who never loved his brother but for his own credit, living upon him." The French ministers were as much disgusted with him as the Cecils were, and yet Essex would have pretended that the latter only hated him out of malice to himself.

† About this time an office in Ireland becoming vacant, which appears to have been a sort of sinecure, Lord Essex tried all he could to get it for his friend Sir Francis Allen, though the Lord Treasurer, as Mr. Standen himself wrote, "according to his laudable custom, having an eye to her Majesty's profit, procureth to extinguish the same."

professing all possible disinterestedness in his letters to the Queen, it is extremely evident, that he was bent upon not giving way to Coke, but resolved, if he could, to pass over his head into the Attorney's place,* let who would oppose it.

In November of this year Lord Burghley had a very severe attack of illness, and among those who went to inquire after his health was Mr. Standen, who wrote word of it to his friend Mr. Bacon, telling him that the servant would not admit him, " and even," says he, " as I was going down stairs, was at my back, the QUEEN, who, unknown to me, had been visiting my Lord ; so I staid among the rest to see her Majesty pass. A little after I met with Mr. W. Cooke, who told me, that true it was that my Lord had somewhat rested the night past, but that this morning his Lordship had a very rigorous fit of pain and dangerous." On the 17th of November, he reports his Lordship's amendment, so as to be able " to sit up on his pallet, and write, and sign letters."

In the fifth book of the first volume of Mr. Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, there are many letters from Lord Burghley to his son, Sir Robert Cecil, written in the course of this, and the few following years of his Lordship's life, upon various subjects appertaining to the affairs both of the Church and State. These letters it is sufficient to refer to, being so easily to be consulted, if occasions should arise, and which certainly, without manifest occasion, need not be repeated in a work already so voluminous, especially as some extracts from them will appear in their proper places.

The first thing we have to notice at the commencement of the year 1594, though perhaps it should rather be referred to an earlier period,† is " A memorial of sundry necessary things to be put in execution for the service of the realm now toward the spring of the year, upon the formidable preparation of the Spaniard," drawn up by Lord Burghley. It may be seen, among Strype's Records, Annals

* See his letter to Essex, Birch i. 129, where he speaks of Coke under the nickname of the Huddler. We cannot help remarking the curious circumstance of our being able to peruse this letter at this time, both in MS. and print, when it was not without the following postscript, written at the least, more than two hundred and thirty years ago. " I pray, Sir, let not my jargon privilege my letter from burning, because it is not such but the light sheweth through ;" but what is more extraordinary, it is stated that Lord Essex did burn it. It was nevertheless found among Mr. Anthony Bacon's letters in Lambeth library.—See Bacon's Works, London, 1819, vol. vi.

† The date is January 8, 1593. This would, according to the mode of reckoning in those days, be the very beginning of the year 1594. It is, in fact, immaterial to which year it belongs; but is another instance of the confusion arising from the inattention shewn to what Dr. Birch calls the difference of old and new style, and the double commencement of the year.

iv. No. ciii. It provides "for the reviewing, completing, and training the land forces throughout the kingdom, horse and foot; for the examination, arming, and equipping all her Majesty's own ships; providing soldiers and mariners to serve in them, and for the taking up as many merchants' and subjects' ships, as might be wanting to accompany the royal fleets; for ascertaining the state of the ordnance and armoury; and for having an eye upon ill-contented persons." At whatever time it was drawn up, it plainly shews to whom the nation looked for all preparations and means of defence, in times of danger.

From Camden's account, the King of Scotland's situation was, at this time, a very peculiar one; while the Presbyterian Ministers there were trying to impress Elizabeth with a notion that James was more favourable to the Papists than to themselves, and thereby exciting apprehensions that he might countenance the intended invasion of the Spaniards, the English Catholics, who had been strenuous assertors of his mother's title to the Crown of England, persuaded of his steadiness in the Protestant cause, began to think of substituting some English Papist in his room, as successor, at least, to the throne, if Elizabeth should die; or if she could be otherwise disposed of, which we fear was constantly contemplated,* as immediate possessor of the throne; but as they could not speedily agree upon a proper person of their own persuasion, they cast their eyes upon the Earl of Essex, pretending to trace his title from Thomas of Woodstock, son of Edward III. Others were for the Infanta of Spain, principally those who had fled their country, and were in foreign parts, as Persons, Cardinal Allen, Sir Francis Englefield, &c. insisting upon it, that none but a Roman Catholic should be King, how near soever he might be by

* Of the designs on foot this year for the destruction of Elizabeth, an account may be seen in Camden and other authors. The Spaniards were accused of having bribed Lopez, a Portuguese Jew (the Queen's domestic physician), and others of the same nation, to destroy both the Queen and Antonio Perez, of whom more hereafter, and for which they were tried, condemned, and executed; as were also some others, convicted of being sent upon the same errand, with money to bear their charges, from the fugitives in the Low Countries, upon the full belief, as Camden shews, that Princes excommunicated by the Pope, were to be rooted out. In Strype's Annals (Nos. cxviii—cxxxii.) may be seen the accounts given in to the government of dangerous and suspicious persons. It would appear, from Birch's Memoirs, that the Cecils at first thought favourably of Lopez, but that Essex was the person most active in bringing him to justice, which probably influenced Bacon, who has left, among his political tracts, what is called "A true report of the detestable treason intended by Don Roderigo Lopez, a physician attending upon the person of the Queen's Majesty." It seems to have been a most intricate affair.

blood; and that the ancient laws concerning hereditary succession should be altered. Camden does not appear to think there was any serious design of setting Essex on the throne; and as to the Infanta, it being exactly in his way to examine her genealogical claims, he seems to have found such flaws and interruptions in the line of her descent, as very much to reduce her pretensions, had they been judged worthy of any serious consideration.* While these projects, however, were in hand, an heir was born to James, Henry, afterwards Prince of Wales, to whom, as some earnest possibly of his family claims, Elizabeth stood godmother;† and, as the King and herself soon came to a better understanding, upon the subject of the dangers to which the Protestant interests were still exposed, and his constancy seemed to be proof against the attempts of the Spaniards, and the encouragement they had received from the Earls of Huntley, Angus, and Errol, the apprehensions from that quarter were greatly lessened. The King, from Camden's account, seems to have conducted himself with great firmness on this occasion, both with regard to England and the rebel Lords. But to judge of the grounds of the Queen's distrust of him at this time, we must refer to those authors who have had occasion to enter more largely into the subject. It is very certain that the following caution occurs in a confidential letter from the Dean of Durham to the Lord Treasurer, April 9, 1594: "I pray God the King's protestations be not over-well believed; who is a deeper dissembler, by all men's judgments that know him best, than is thought possible for his years." We should not mention this,‡ but that, in most histories, all dissimulation would seem to have centered in the English court; whereas, we are entirely persuaded, that against no court in Europe could more dissimulation have been practised, than against the court of England during the reign of Elizabeth; from the effects of which nothing could have preserved her, but the extreme vigilance and counterplots (if we may so say) of a set of ministers apparently sent into the world to preserve her and her kingdoms ;* to preserve, in short, the Protestant Church, and the freedom and independence, not of England only, but of Great Britain, as (happily) it soon after came to be called ! Though that refers to an event beyond the limits of our own undertaking.

* Persons, however, had particularly discussed her claim in the seventh chapter of his Conference on the Succession, 1594, already cited; a work directed, as the title-page sets forth, to the Earl of Essex.

See also Moule's Bibliotheca Heraldica, 44, 45.

Lord Burghley appears, by many existing documents, to have continued as much as ever the referee of all parties ;† but it would be an endless task to attempt to enumerate the many applications made to him, and the great variety of cases submitted to his judgment. The catalogues of our public repositories alone, would be sufficient to prove what we say, if any of our readers should be disposed to take the trouble of examining merely the heads of their contents. To have been reviled and abused by the decided enemies of his Queen and country, can only redound to his praise ; but it is impossible not to perceive, in the innumerable addresses presented to him, an almost invariable disposition to give him credit for a degree of equity and impartiality and friendly feelings towards persons of very opposite characters and parties, and for mitigating, at least, the troubles and distresses of those whom he could not altogether relieve.‡

* Fuller, in his Holy State, observes, speaking of these very times, " And, therefore, statesmen must sometimes use crooked shoes to fit curled feet. The honest politician would soon be beggared, if, receiving black money from cheators, he pays them in good silver, and not in their own coins back again." In writing of the sixteenth century, we are obliged to cite such passages. Honest Fuller himself confesses, that he could look no longer on those whirlpools of State, lest his head should turn giddy.

† The writer of the MS. among the Sloane volumes, in the British Museum, printed by Mr. Ellis (Orig. Letters, Second Series, vol. iii. p. 190.), observes of Lord Burghley, that, " in matters of religion, he dissented from the Papist and the Puritan, disliking the superstition of the one, and the singularity of the other ; holding the mid-way between both, as a mean between the extremes." As this is the testimony of one who lived in his Lordship's house, and knew him well, it cannot reasonably be contested, especially as every thing we have been able to collect, concerning his principles, appears to confirm it.

‡ In the Memoirs of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, 1738, the following long passage occurs, upon this head. To omit it would be wrong, in such a work as the present.

" The change made in religion in the beginning of the Queen's reign, had so incensed the head and all the members of the Romish Church, that they left nothing unattempted to embroil the State, either at home or abroad ; supposing that, if by any means, a revolution in Government could be brought about, a revolution in Church affairs would also happen. Sir William Cecil defeated all their endeavours for eleven years together, disappointed their plots, and hindered them from acquiring any force capable of supporting a rebellion. This he did, first by carefully attending to the state of the Church ; which, as it owed its embellishment, so was it also indebted for its ornaments, and for its preservation, to the care of this Statesman. He it was who preserved

In the fourth volume of Strype's Annals, we find, under the present year, several papers and letters abounding in such acknowledgments; in No. cxxxvii., purporting to be the humble petition of a most unfortunate Lady, the Lady Margaret Nevyl (daughter of the attainted Earl of Westmoreland), to the Queen's Majesty, when she lay under the sentence of death, destitute of money and all family connexions, we find the following passage: "At the assizes, last summer, being destitute of help, it pleased the good Bishop of Duresme, at the motion of my Lord Treasurer and the Judges, to take me into his house; where he only hath and doth yet wholly relieve [me], and by his godly and sound earnest instructions he hath, I most humbly praise God, fully reformed me in religion." And how much that worthy Prelate, by his own letters to the Lord Treasurer,

Episcopacy; who maintained the Bishops in the enjoyment of those rights and revenues, which are so highly useful, as well as honourable, to the form of religion subsisting among us. He it was, to whom the Clergy of all degrees addressed themselves, when they were vexed with enemies, either of the Romish or any other persuasion. He it was, who, in the midst of all his various and weighty business, turned a gracious ear to all complaints, of a private, as well as a public nature; gave his utmost assistance in redressing them; and where that could not be done, afforded them the comfort of kind and friendly letters; of which their intrinsic excellence hath caused numbers to be preserved, which now confer honour on his memory, which living, he out of modesty declined." There is more to the purpose, but this is sufficient to confirm what we have ourselves been often compelled to speak of generally, rather than particularly, from the immense amount of still-existing memorials. In the course of the year of which we are treating, being anxious to have the see of York, then vacant, properly filled, he wrote as follows to his son, Sir Robert: "Although I know her Majesty has care of all her Church offices, to have them bestowed upon persons worthy the vocations, both as well for learning and godly life, as for virtue; yet, I pray you shew to her Majesty, what my Lord of Huntingdon writeth for the supply of the Archbishopric of York; whereof, the last incumbent was a person of great sufficiency, and as well approved in that charge as any Prelate in England. It is likely many will gape after it. And I wish the choice were rather in her Majesty's own judgment, than in the ambitious desire of them which seek Quæ sua sunt, non quæ Dei et ecclesiæ, 5 Oct. 1594.

"Your loving Father,

"W. Burghley."

From two letters, in Strype's Appendix, vol. iv. addressed to Lord Burghley, by Hutton (removed from Durham to York), it would appear that the choice of the new Archbishop was conformable to the will and inclination both of the Queen and his Lordship, Nos. cxxxiii. cxxxiv. His predecessor was Archbishop Peirse, who died at the age of seventy-one. His friend and chaplain, Dr. King, preached the sermon at his funeral, the commendatory passages of which may be seen in Strype, vol. iv. p. 282. No. cxxxix.

sought to help that miserable Lady, will be seen from other records in the same collection.*

It was in the course of this year also, that Loftus, Archbishop of Dublin, and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, had occasion to address a letter to the Lord Treasurer, some passages of which it would be an injustice to both parties not to introduce into this memoir. His Grace thus expresses himself in a letter, dated, May 27, 1594.

"May it please your good Lordship,—As often as I look back unto the course of my life, which draws towards an end, and call to my remembrance the manifold crosses and grievous troubles which, in my place and vocation, I have endured, so often must I confess, that next after the goodness of God, and her Majesty's great grace, your honourable patronage and protection of me hath been the only means of my deliverance. Wherefore, I most humbly crave your Lordship's pardon, to license me (being destitute of all other means to make any requital for the least of your favours which you have poured upon me), in all my letters, to acknowledge my most bounden duty and thankfulness; which is the only thing I can present unto you."

The Archbishop's case seemed to be a very delicate one; some malicious persons had so prejudiced the Queen against him, that she would neither receive his answers to their accusations, nor put him upon his trial.† In this dilemma, he seems to have been upon the brink of making things worse, by taking an imprudent step, had not Lord Burghley prevented him, whose advice seems to have been well taken. "For remedy," says his Grace, "I have no other refuge, but still to fly to your honourable protection: humbly beseeching your Lordship, that as it has pleased God, in these our days, to make you even the father of all good counsel, and the most ancient Counsellor that ever served Prince, that you will not suffer a poor servitor of my conscience, after so many hazards of my life in her Majesty's service [he had been thirty-three years a Privy Counsellor in that turbulent and disturbed kingdom], to be without cause thus unworthily disgraced."

* A sister of this Lady, four years afterwards, fell into a like trouble, as appears from a letter addressed to the Lord Treasurer, by the Bishop of Durham, May, 27, 1598, [Annals, iv. No. cclv.] This Lady, Lady Catherine Gray, a widow, does not seem to have borne so good a character as her sister; however, the Bishop seems, by his letter, to have looked for lenient treatment, though he hints, that the pardon granted to the Lady Margaret, on her conversion, had been abused by her subsequent relapse.

† The case, however, had been referred to special commissioners, whose decision he requests his Lordship to quicken, being ready to transmit to them answers to every point objected.

The conclusion of his Grace's letter is very striking. "My hope is, that during your Lordship's days (which God long continue), I shall not want a friend to inform her Majesty of my long and painful services, and of my zealous affection and desire to do unto her Highness any acceptable service. But woe is me, that I now perceive, to my great discomfort, your Lordship doth begin to complain of sickness and want of strength in body, to protect such as always heretofore have depended upon you. My good Lord, I have no other to rely upon, being unknown to all the rest of their Lordships. Hitherto, under God and her Majesty, I never had dependency upon any but the Earl of Sussex and your Lordship; neither do I mean to seek a new friend so long as you do live, most humbly beseeching your Lordship to be a mean for me to your son, Sir Robert Cecil, that under you I may depend upon his honourable favour in my just and honest causes; and I promise your Lordship hereby, upon my honesty and credit, I will never seek his favour in any bad or dishonest cause. I commend your Lordship, by my most earnest prayers, to God's best graces. AD. DUBLIN CANC."

Having spoken of one Irish Prelate, we are tempted to copy a letter of a very different nature, from one of that bench, to Lord Burghley, but of nearly the same date. It was from the Bishop of Limerick, who seems to have been rather put out of his way, by being called upon to reside on his see. It was written from York.

"My most honourable good Lord,

"I beseech your Honour, that I may have license (seeing I am to live in Ireland), to transport with me fifty ewes, eight rams, six mares, twenty cows, and two bulls, for mine own breed; and ten muskets and other needful furniture, for my own safety. And that my household stuff, which I carry, with my books, chests, trunks, and other my carriages, may be transported with myself or with my servants, without any let or trouble to me or my servants, by searchers or customers, or other officers, to be offered unto us. I most humbly take my leave, evermore praying for your Honour's healthful and happy preservation,

"Your Honour's, &c. JO. LIMRICENS."

If we had not learned to be suspicious of dates, we should say that, in the summer of 1593, Lord Burghley, as Chancellor of Cambridge, received an address from the Heads of Houses, "touching restraint of plays and shows there." Strype has printed such a paper in the fourth volume of his annals, No.

civ. as bearing date July 17, 1593; and yet in Mr. Ellis's interesting publication of Original Letters, First Series, vol. iii. letter ccxxx., we find so soon afterwards as January 28, 1594, an application to his Lordship, signed by the Head and Fellows of Trinity College, to borrow the robes from the Tower of London, to be worn in a tragedy about to be performed there. It is possible, however, that the interval between these two addresses might be eighteen, rather than six months. Whatever the case might be, Mr. Ellis will be found to have supplied some valuable information upon the subject of dramatic representations in the Universities, during this reign and the following, and to which we should wish to refer the reader. The restraints solicited, we would observe, seem to have regarded wandering players, the companies of particular Noblemen, &c.—See Ellis. This may help to reconcile the papers above.

In the obituary of this year, we have to notice the deaths of many conspicuous persons; and in the first place, of Cardinal Allen,* an inveterate foe to the Protestant Church of England, and led thereby to countenance measures, so adverse to the freedom and independence of his native country, and to the personal security and regal authority of his proper Sovereign, as to render it impossible to regard him in any other light than that of a justly proscribed traitor. The opprobrious names heaped upon Elizabeth in his celebrated Admonition, some specimens of which Mr. Turner has been careful to throw into a note, vol. ii. p. 504, are quite sufficient to evince the malignity of his feelings towards her. He appears to have been of a respectable family, learned, and of fascinating manners; but notoriously at the head of all the foreign associations to restore Popery, and as a preliminary, to remove Elizabeth from the throne of her ancestors. That he directly encouraged assassins to murder her, we do not believe; but that such persons were to be found in the seminaries over which he presided, and that some of their designs were known to him, without his making any honourable disclosure of their wicked purposes, we do believe; and that he was a willing instrument in the hands of the Pope, and the King of Spain, to reduce England to her pristine obedience to the See of Rome, there can, we think, be no doubt. Camden has given a very fair account of him, and for further information the reader may consult the Biographia Britannica, particularly note i., wherein may be seen the title, &c. of the book he put forth in 1583, in answer to Lord Burghley's Execution of Justice, &c.

* Alan, or Allyn; Biog. Brit.

Two very eminent Prelates, both of them well known to the Lord Treasurer, also departed this life, in the year 1594; we speak of Aylmer, Bishop of London, and Cooper, Bishop of Winchester. The former died, full of years, on the 3d of June 1594, and having had the good fortune to be one of those whose particular history, that indefatigable ecclesiastical antiquary and biographer, Strype, chose to relate at length, we can do no more than refer to his valuable collections, illustrative of his life, Oxford edit. 1821. We ought, however, at the same time to add, that being one of those Prelates who exerted himself much against the Puritans, his character does not stand so clear with that party; who will not allow him to have been, what Mr. Strype calls him, an "humble Bishop;" nor do we think that he was so in the main; but he certainly had great provocations given him by the Puritans, who regarded him as a deserter of their cause. To be able to draw a line between those who have praised, and those who have censured this learned Prelate, too much in both instances, the reader would do well to look to the account given of him in the Biographia Britannica. Cooper, Bishop of Winchester, died on the 29th of April of this year, a very learned man, of whom we have before had to speak, as having dedicated his great work, the Thesaurus, to the Lords Leicester and Burghley, Chancellors of the two Universities. The following lines so shortly, and yet so circumstantially, relate his story, that we cannot forbear transcribing them.

Camden has recorded the deaths of several other persons, chiefly of Nobility; as of the Earl of Derby, the Lord Dacres, the Lords Euers, Chandos, and Montjoy. And to the same author, we may refer for annual accounts of the state of Ireland, which do not regularly fall within the scope of this memoir, but are well worthy attention.

Before we conclude the history of this year, we cannot avoid noticing the following instance of Essex's forwardness to accomplish his own purposes at Court, in defiance of all opposition; particularly of the Cecils, whose counter-pretensions we shall find well and reasonably insisted upon by Sir Robert.

Mr. Standen, in a letter to Mr. Bacon, speaking of an examination of Lopez before Lord Essex and Sir Robert Cecil, says, "These two returning back in a coach together, Sir Robert began of himself, saying, 'My Lord, the Queen has resolved, ere five days pass, without any further delay, to make an Attorney-General. I pray your Lordship to let me know whom you will favour.' The Earl answered, 'That he wondered that Sir Robert should ask him that question, seeing it could not be unknown to him, that resolutely against all whomsoever, he stood for Francis Bacon.' 'Good Lord,' replied Sir Robert, 'I wonder your Lordship should go about to spend your strength in so unlikely or impossible a matter,' desiring his Lordship to allege to him but one only precedent of so raw a youth to that place of such moment. The Earl very cunningly working upon him said, 'That for the Attorneyship, which was but an ordinary office other than the Prince's favour, he could produce no pattern, because he had not made any search for that purpose; but that a younger than Francis Bacon, of less learning, and of no greater experience, was sueing and striving with all force for an office of far greater importance, greater charge, and greater weight, than the Attorneyship;' such an one, the Earl said, he could name to him. Sir Robert's answer was, 'That he well knew his Lordship meant him; and that admitting that both his years and experience were small, yet weighing the school which he studied in, and the great wisdom and learning of his schoolmaster, and the pains and observation he daily passed in that school, he thought his forces and wisdom to be sufficient to sway that machine; alleging withal, his father's deserts in these his long and painful travels, of so long an administration, to merit a mark of gratitude from her Majesty in the person of his son, and with regard to the affair of Mr. Francis Bacon, he desired his Lordship to consider of it. 'If at least,' said he, 'your Lordship had spoken of the Solicitorship, that might have been of easier digestion to her Majesty.' The Earl upon this answered, 'Digest me no digestions; for the Attorneyship for Francis is that I must have; and in that will I spend all my power, might, authority, and amity; and with tooth and nail defend and procure the same for him against whomsoever; and that whosoever getteth this office, out of my hands, for any other, before he have it, it shall cost him the coming by. And this be you assured of, Sir Robert, for now I fully declare myself; and for your own part, Sir Robert, I think strange both of my Lord Treasurer and you, that can have the mind to seek the preference of a stranger before so near a kinsman, for if you weigh in a balance the parts every way of his competitor and him, only excepting five poor years of admitting to a house of Court before Francis, you shall find in all other respects whatsoever, no comparison between them.' "

All this might be very friendly towards Francis Bacon, but a more disgustingly rude,* arbitrary, and presumptuous interposition, we never, we think, read of: not to speak of the unmannerly depreciation of Sir Robert's own talents and pretensions, we may surely be allowed to ask who, upon this occasion, was Francis Bacon's competitor? No less than Edward Coke, afterwards Lord Chief Justice of England; and, to adopt the leading article of his life in the Biographia Britannica, "one of the most eminent lawyers this kingdom ever produced!" And, after all, what might have been said of the Cecils, by the friends and favourers of Coke, had they, as peremptorily and arbitrarily as Essex would have done, preferred their own kinsman, to such a known lawyer as his opponent, being all the while willing to have Bacon made Solicitor-General. Coke, besides, was ten years older than Bacon, and actually Speaker of the House of Commons at the time; and, while this young and impetuous Lord was thus deciding upon men's abilities, and taunting Sir Robert Cecil for his presumption in aspiring to be Secretary of State, Bacon was, in pursuit of his own designs, lavishing praises upon the very uncle and cousin whom Essex was depreciating all he could, and representing to be maliciously bent against their relative,† a relative certainly of unbounded fame in after ages,

* He scarcely seems to have had the common politeness of a gentleman in his treatment of the Cecils, calling Sir Robert, slightingly, Monsieur le Bossu, on account of some defect in his figure, and encouraging Standen to make quite as great a mockery of the Lord Treasurer, even in his letters to Mr. Bacon. It is needless to repeat the rude terms in which he often wrote of the Lord Treasurer, who certainly had no reason to like such a man as Standen, independent of other causes, much less to submit to have him forced upon him, by his back friends. See what his Lordship had to say for himself upon this, Birch, i. 189.

† We ought not to omit citing Bacon's own words, in his observations upon the libel of Persons against Lord Burghley, page 70, "He [the libeller] saith, he hath brought in his second son, Sir Robert Cecil, to be of the Council, who hath neither wit nor experience; which speech is as notorious an untruth as is in all his libel: for, it is confessed by all men that know the gentleman, that he hath one of the rarest and most excellent wits of England, with a singular delivery and application of the same, whether it be to use a continued speech, or to negociate, or to couch in writing, or to make report, or discreetly to consider of the circumstances, and aptly to draw things to a point. And all this joined with a very good nature, and a great respect to all men, as is daily more and more revealed; and, for his experience, it is easy to think that his training and but not so well known then. Though, to do Essex credit, he probably might have perceived the fecundity of his genius, and the depth of his learning, as a young man; and, indeed, about this time, he first began greatly to distinguish himself in Westminster Hall,* of which the Lord Treasurer was not backward to take great notice, as well as others. And as soon as the Solicitor-General's place became really vacant, by Sir Thomas Egerton's removal to the Rolls, and Coke's succeeding him as Attorney-General, Sir Robert Cecil wrote to the former in terms of the greatest kindness concerning his cousin, Francis Bacon, notwithstanding the rude manner in which he had been treated by Essex, and expressing his great desire to have him preferred.† Moreover, in the letter Essex himself wrote to Francis Bacon the very next day, he tells him, that in urging his suit to the Queen, she observed to him, that none thought Bacon fit for the place but himself and the Lord Treasurer.‡ It was well for those who had Essex for a friend at court; but he seems to have been an ungenerous foe. Thus, in this very letter, and upon the competition going forward, he tells Bacon, that, in his conference with the Queen, "because he found that Tanfield had been most propounded to her, he did most disable him."§ Now Tanfield was a man, by all accounts, of great reputation otherwise, and one who rose to be Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer.

As the issue of this unpleasant contest between Essex and the Cecils belongs to another reign, and may be said to relate more to Sir Robert Cecil than his venerable father, we notice the beginnings of it, only to shew how hardly it fell out for the peace and quietness of the Lord Treasurer in his latter days, and how helps hath made it already such, as many, that have served long prentishood for it, have not obtained the like. So, as if that be true, Qui beneficium digno dat, omnes obligat, not his father only, but the State is bound unto her Majesty, for the choice and employment of so sufficient and worthy a gentleman."

* It is curious that the Queen seems to have distrusted the sufficiency of his knowledge of law, though quite aware of his general learning and abilities. "She did acknowledge," says Essex, in one of his letters at this time, to Bacon, "you had a great wit, and an excellent gift of speech, and much other good learning; but in law she rather thought you could make show to the utmost of your knowledge, than that you were deep."

† See Birch, i. 165.

‡ From the first letter in the Cabala, we may see how ready Bacon himself was to acknowledge Lord Burghley's "favourable endeavours" to procure him the Solicitor-Generalship. See also Strype's Annals, iv. No. cxlvii.

§ In the disabling of his competitors, Bacon encouraged him all he could.—Birch, i. 168.

hastily it commenced; how impetuous Essex was, and how determined he seemed to be, to resent for his friends, as well as himself, every obstruction thrown in the way of his own plans and designs; and how unreasonable it must have been to expect that the Cecils could look with a very favourable eye on a person so bent upon engrossing every thing to himself, of controlling the Queen, and forcing his own complaining and dissatisfied friends and partizans on the court. Even Lady Bacon herself, who occasionally doubted about the good-will of the Cecils, when the post of Solicitor-General was given to another, observed of Essex, in a letter to Anthony Bacon, that, though he shewed great affection, he marred all by violent courses. "I am heartily sorry," she added, "to hear how he [the Earl] sweareth and gameth unreasonably." Her Ladyship, it is well known, was of a Puritanical cast, and very anxious, much to her credit, to preserve her sons, as well from the contagion of ill example in a moral point of view, as from Popery, of which she was always very suspicious. With these apprehensions constantly disturbing her, she wrote a very curious letter to her eldest son, Mr. Anthony Bacon, about this time, which deserves to be transcribed, considering the persons to whom it relates. We copy, of course, from Birch: "The same day Lady Bacon sent a letter to her son Anthony, that she had the day before written to Lady Walsingham, and by her to the Countess of Essex, her daughter, who took it well, and thanked her, the Countess being then very near her travelling time. Lady Bacon warns him to beware of the Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton, and Lord Privy Seal, and then an intimate friend of the Earl of Essex. 'He is,' says she, 'a dangerous intelligencing man; no doubt a subtle Papist inwardly, and lieth in wait. Peradventure he hath some close working with Στανδεν and the Σπανιαρδε, and τοισιοις. Be not too open. He will betray you to divers, and to your Αυντε Ρουσσελ among others. The Duke had been alive but by his practising, and still soliciting him to the Duke's ruin, and the Εαρλε of Αρυνδελ. Avoid his familiarity, as you love the truth and yourself; a very instrument of the Spanish Papists; for he, pretending courtesy, worketh mischief perilously. I have long known him, and observed him; his workings have been stark naught. Procul esto.'" In the postscript, written in Greek, she expresses her great concern on account of the Earl of Essex's unchaste manner of life.*

* She wrote again to her son not long afterwards, to dissuade him from accepting an offer made by Essex, of quitting his own house, and becoming an inmate of Essex's house. Her objections were reasonable and good, but not available.—Birch, i. 278.

We may be able, from this letter alone, to judge what a strange party it was, that, through the means of the Earl of Essex, had been excited to oppose and perplex the Cecils; and, indeed, to overthrow and disgrace them, had it been possible, but which did not prove to be the case. The Queen knew their worth too well, so that, as Fuller writes of the Lord Treasurer particularly, "God measured his outward happiness not by an ordinary standard: how many great undertakers in state, set in a cloud, whereas he shone to the last. Herein much is to be ascribed to the Queen's constancy, who, to confute the observation of feminine fickleness, where her favour did light, it did lodge."

It was not till late in the following year that the office of Solicitor-General was assigned to Mr. Serjeant Fleming, to the great mortification and disappointment of Essex, who felt so much for his friend, as to insist upon giving him an estate in the way of compensation, which consisted of Twickenham Park and garden, and which Bacon afterwards sold for 1800*l., much below its reputed value.

We must not conclude this year without noticing the marriage of the Lady Elizabeth Vere, the eldest of Lord Burghley's grand-daughters, by Anne, Countess of Oxford, with William, Earl of Derby, who succeeded to that title by the death of his elder brother Ferdinand, about the time of his marriage. This marriage may be said to have connected Lord Burghley's family a second time, and more directly, indeed, with the illustrious house of Suffolk, the mother of William, Earl of Derby, being the Lady Margaret, daughter of the Earl of Cumberland, by the Lady Eleanor, one of the coheirs of Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, married to Mary, the sister of Henry VIII., Dowager Queen of France.

It was not long after this marriage that Lord Burghley had a curious case to decide between the Earl, his son-in-law, and the widow and daughters of the deceased Earl, relative to the Lordship of the Isle of Man; upon which occasion he decided, and rightly enough, as it appeared, in favour of the Crown and of the family of Earl Ferdinand, which so pleased the Queen, that, through Sir Robert Cecil, she sent him a million of thanks. Upon which Lord Burghley wrote to his son, to desire him to tell the Queen that she was over liberal, "to give a million of thanks where she oweth none;" adding, "and, to write seriously, I have done nothing in this cause but what my conscience did prescribe me; and if the Earl should think otherwise of me, as I doubt he may be thereto led, yet he shall understand that I gave my child to him, but not my conscience nor my honour, which no blood shall ever gain of me.

"W. BURGHLEY."

The decision, in fact, was—first, in favour of the Crown, through some flaw in the original grant of the Lordship to the Stanley family; but Earl William, in consequence of the decision, was obliged to pay a large sum of money to the heiresses of his brother, to quit their claims; and afterwards obtained, if we rightly understand the case, a fresh grant from the Crown. The three heiresses of Earl Ferdinand, with whom Earl William had to contend, had married the Lord Chandos, the Earl of Bridgewater, and the Earl of Huntingdon.

Camden begins his account of this year, with noticing the determination of the King of Scots, to prepare himself against the Spaniards, to restrain the deadly feuds of the Scots amongst themselves, and all hostilities against England. In speaking also of the execution of certain persons for high treason, in compassing and contriving the death of the Queen, he makes the following remarks.

"The villany, indeed, of the fugitives, in relation to such wicked attempts, was notorious about this time: while some encouraged murderers to commit parricide upon the Queen, others, greedy to get their money, offered themselves to commit the fact, and being once hired to do it, presently revealed the same; and others, false and treacherous amongst themselves, put one another forward to their destruction, before they were aware of it, entrapped one another with cunning devices, and many times charged one another with notorious falsities." For the details of all these proceedings, the histories themselves must be consulted, as well as the State Trials; but Camden seems to be borne out by facts, in all he says, of the murderous plots and conspiracies on foot, the double-dealings of the parties implicated, and of the extreme prevarication in almost every instance, of the witnesses examined.

However needful it was, at this time, for England and France to unite in resisting the ambitious views of Spain, it was not easy to accomplish any very cordial co-operation on the part of Henry and Elizabeth; the former having notoriously made use of the Queen's forces and money, without sufficient attention to her own immediate danger from the Spaniards, and often, indeed, without fulfilling the engagements he had entered into, in procuring her help. He was now become, however, greatly in want of succour, to save Cambray from the Spaniards, and did not hesitate to demand fresh aid, with such dispatch and haste, as was quite impossible to be performed. In the meanwhile, Cambray was lost, and a Minister from Henry, arriving soon after, to press more strongly upon the Queen the urgent necessity of more auxiliary troops being speedily sent over, and rather indelicately imputing the loss of Cambray to the Queen's neglect of the King's former applications, Elizabeth was provoked to answer him extempore, in a speech, the substance of which is related by Camden, and which will be found to do her Majesty great credit.

Great as Henry IV. was, in many respects, it was almost impossible for England, at this time, to regard him with much respect; his submission to the See of Rome was alone sufficient to degrade him in the eyes of so high-spirited a Princess as Elizabeth. The Pope prescribed the degrading conditions (for so we must call them), on which he was to be admitted into the bosom of the Catholic Church, which were, that he should abjure all heresies, introduce the Catholic faith even into the principality of Bearne, and nominate Catholic Magistrates there; publish and enforce the decrees of the Council of Trent throughout all France; bestow all the magistracies and dignities of the realm on Catholics alone, promote the expulsion of heretics, and write letters to all the Princes of Christendom, to give notice of his conversion, abjuration of Protestantism, and profession of the Catholic faith!

In the meanwhile, England was threatened with another Spanish Armada, stronger and better appointed than was the case with the former; and yet she was required to continue her aids to France and to the States. In such an emergency, it can be no wonder that Lord Burghley, in virtue of his high office, should take into consideration the practicability of recovering some money from the States. A large sum was owing to Sir Horatio Pallavicini, for which the Queen paid great interest, and it was judged expedient to apply to the States, to disburden her, at least, of this heavy charge. Sir Thomas Bodley was commissioned to lay this before the States, who pleaded their inability, with some questions as to the obligation they were under to answer such demands at that time. Camden has given a pretty full account of these negotiations, and more may be seen in Birch's Memoirs. It ended in the States agreeing to relieve her Majesty from many heavy expenses, and the Queen abated somewhat of her demands. They had contributed, it seems, to the pecuniary wants of the French King, which induced suspicions, that they might place themselves under the protection of France, and desert England.

It was while this negotiation was pending, that Essex endeavoured to draw Sir Thomas Bodley away from the Cecils, to his own party, and in the ensuing year we shall find him bringing him forward, as a direct competitor of Sir Robert Cecil, for the post of Secretary.

Lord Burghley continued his watchfulness for the security and defence of the nation with the same diligence and minute attention to circumstances as ever. In the autumn of 1595, upon the apprehension of an invasion from Spain,* he drew up to this effect, a memorial for defence of dangerous places of the land, in

* From a letter addressed by Lord Burghley to his son, Sir Robert Cecil, Oct. 3, 1595, we learn that, at this time, the King of Spain caused a book to be published in support of his claim to the crown of England, and that of his daughter, the Infanta of Spain, in prejudice of the King of Scots' pretensions; and that, in support of such claims, and to the disturbance of England, he was sending large quantities of gunpowder to Ireland: of which Lord Burghley was exceedingly anxious to have the King of Scots duly apprised. See Peck's Desiderata Curiosa. Lord Burghley, at this time, seems to have been grievously afflicted with the gout. The letter concludes, From my house in the Strand, subsigned with my seal, for want of a right hand; and, in a short time afterwards, being anxious to attend the Council, notwithstanding his infirmities, he writes to his son, several counties, which is very curious, and may be seen in the common repository of such things, Strype's Annals, vol. iv. No. clvi. Among the list of Lieutenants, to whom the Queen's letters were to be addressed for this service, his own name appears three times, as the Queen's Lieutenant, for the several counties of Essex, Hertfordshire, and Lincoln.

We have a remarkable instance, among the records of this year, of the Lord Treasurer's influence, notwithstanding the great, and we cannot help adding, spiteful and vexatious opposition of Essex. Bilson, Warden of Winchester, a very learned and zealous friend to the establishment, was anxious to obtain the vacant bishopric of Worcester. The Archbishop had previously, "being besieged," as it is said, "by some about him," recommended Dr. James. Dr. Bilson, therefore, wrote to the Lord Treasurer, in these terms: "But my facility being surprised by others, I am forced to appeal to your honourable and indifferent wisdom, and favour, since her Majesty useth the advice of more than one in these matters; and am willing, by your Lordship's censure, to stand or fall, as never meaning to molest friends for any thing that your grave and worthy judgment shall think unfit." Dr. Bilson obtained the bishopric, and was not long after advanced to Winchester.

We cannot help copying next, a letter from the very celebrated Sir Henry Savile to Lady Russel (sister of the deceased Lady Burghley), to ask for her interest with the Treasurer, for the Provostship of Eton.

"Right Honourable and my very good Lady,—As I was bold with your Ladyship at the beginning of my suit, so I must be importunate now at the conclusion. My fortune always hath been hitherto, to receive still my despatch by my Lord Treasurer's only means; so was it when I obtained Merton College, in Oxford, and so must it be now for Eton. I know his Lordship's favourable opinion of the matter to her Majesty. His honourable promise of favour, made to me at Theobalds, gave me courage to begin, and her Majesty's direct nomination at Nonsuch, which I saw in his Lordship's own hand, gave me hope to continue. It remaineth, but that his Lordship would vouchsafe to perfect his own work with a prosperous and happy conclusion.

"To which purpose, I pray you, good Madam, &c. &c. HEN. SAVILE."

"And, if by your speech with her Majesty, she will not mislike to have so bold a person to lodge in her house, I will come as I am (in body not half a man, but in mind passable), to the muster of the rest of my good Lords, her Majesties Counsellors, and my good friends." "Upon your answer I will make no unnecessary delay, by God's permission."

But he was not merely sought to, thus to advance the promotion of learned and eminent persons, but to help those out of trouble, who were promoted. Fletcher, newly translated from the See of Worcester to London, and in a great measure, by Lord Burghley's means, happening to incur the Queen's displeasure, by marrying immediately afterwards "a fine lady and widow," having been married before, she forbade him her presence, and actually caused him to be suspended by the Archbishop. Upon this he applied to the Lord Treasurer, and in less than six months was restored. In returning his thanks for which, after expressing his great satisfaction on the recovery of her Majesty's favour, he observes, "to hear of it also as drawn on and wrought by your Lordship's honourable intercession, and so kind mediation, has greatly added to my joy and alacrity. I do, therefore, give your Lordship my entirest thanks, beseeching your Lordship to be persuaded, that among so many to whom your Lordship hath been magnus ενεργετης, there shall be none found whose duty and devotion shall henceforth exceed mine, who with hand and heart giveth your Lordship this testimony of love and observance.—July, 1595."

But, perhaps, in the whole course of the Lord Treasurer's long life, he had never a more difficult task upon his hands touching ecclesiastical matters, than in the course of this year; for this was the period when the celebrated Lambeth Articles were framed, and when the venerable Lord Treasurer, as well as his Royal Mistress, seemed to have been called upon to decide, as Theologians, upon certain most awful points of Christian Doctrine; particularly upon the great question of partial or universal redemption; the grounds of the predestinarian controversy; an endless controversy, to all appearance, which, happening to be stirred afresh at this time in the University of Cambridge, was particularly referred to the judgment of the Chancellor, amidst all his other cares, heightened by sickness and vexation.

It so happened, that the two Professors of Divinity there, Whitaker of St. John's, and Baro, a learned foreigner, the Margaret Professor,* differed upon these very important points, which could not fail to produce great contrarieties of opinion in that celebrated seat of learning.

* He was a French Protestant, who, being obliged to quit his country, took refuge in England, where he was kindly and charitably entertained by Lord Burghley, who admitted him to his table, and provided for him afterwards, particularly in procuring for him the Margaret Professorship. A very short account of him is given in Bayle's celebrated Dictionary, art. Baron (Pierre), tom. i. 459.

There is so excellent and circumstantial an account of the course of proceedings at Cambridge, to be found in Strype's Life of Whitgift, beginning book iv. chapter xiv., that we must confine ourselves as much as possible to the part Lord Burghley appears to have taken upon the occasion; for he was not only referred to as Chancellor, but actually against the authority assumed by the Archbishop, to interfere, which brought the matter to a more delicate issue; the Chancellor, however, proceeded with his usual impartiality, listening to both parties, securing a proper and deferential respect towards the Primate, and not concealing his own opinions, or rather doubts, upon some of the most curious points brought under discussion. It must be observed, that the most angry party was undoubtedly that of the rigid predestinarians, with Whitaker at their head; the great offenders, in their eyes—Baret, a Fellow of Gonvil and Caius College, and Baro.

Of all that passed in Baret's case this year, the Archbishop drew up, probably for his own satisfaction and vindication, a short recapitulation under twelve heads, which Strype has printed in his second volume of his Life of that learned Prelate. The second offender was Baro, who had excited, if possible, a still greater commotion in the University, from the distinguished situation he held there, as Lady Margaret's Professor, and from his opinions being so directly at variance with those of his brother Professor in divinity, Whitaker. During the visits of the latter to Lambeth, in carrying on the process against Baret, he had prevailed on the Archbishop to have a set of articles drawn up, to which the scholars in the University should be enjoined to conform. These articles were nine in number, and appear to have been presented to the Lord Treasurer, among whose MSS. Strype found them, by Whitaker himself. They bear date Nov. 20, 1595. It has been a puzzling undertaking to account for the Archbishop's assent to these articles, which seem to have been fabricated at Cambridge; and to amount to a decisive sentence against both Baret and Professor Baro, for they are entirely Calvinistical, and therefore, not conformable to the ground-work of the English Reformation, which certainly, as far as we are at all capable of comparing and judging, was much more in agreement with the German confessions of faith.* Heylin has done what he could to account for the Archbishop's publication and sanction of such a set of articles; but his strongest plea is, merely his desire of restoring peace at Cambridge. Satisfaction he could certainly not generally restore by such decisions. Nobody appears to have been sooner offended with them than the Queen, and we cannot think she was a bad judge; though the Archbishop seems to have intimated to the University, that of the truth of the propositions she had no doubt; that she was only unwilling to have such abstruse doctrines made a subject for disputation; to prevent which, indeed, she caused Sir Robert Cecil to write to the Archbishop to stay all further proceedings, " being a matter tender and dangerous to all weak minds;" which she might well say.* Dr. Whitaker, as we have shewn, had no sooner obtained a copy of the Lambeth Articles, than he hastened to present them in person to the Lord Burghley, soon after which, the following conversation is reported to have taken place. " Lord Burghley told the learned Professor, that he had read some part of what he had presented him with; that as for his sermon, ad clerum (which he had also presented him with), it contained mysteries too high for his understanding; and concerning the proposition of predestination, he seemed to mislike of it, and reasoned some while with Whitaker about those heads; and drew, by a similitude, a reason from an earthly prince, inferring thereby that they charged God with cruelty, and might cause men to be desperate in their wickedness. To which that learned man thought fit to say but little, considering that Lord's present weakness, by reason of want of health; but only, that nothing was in that behalf set down, but what was in the article set out by public authority; and so seeing these matters were too deep for him (as he said), he bade him and the other Doctor farewell: and gave them thanks for making him acquainted with these things."

We are glad to have to record so much of this venerable Lord's opinion, upon the articles in question; because Baro having undertaken to argue against the Lambeth Articles, upon the 17th and 21st of the Church Articles, it is not amiss to know, that the sagacity of Lord Burghley had in reality detected the weak point of Calvin's doctrine; and thereby given no small support to the contrary doctrine of Baro; who has the credit, at all events, of having advanced his opinions (as a foreigner), † against his angry, and we must say, overbearing opponents, with great modesty and moderation. Baro had been sent to Cambridge by Lord Burghley, and now it seems, the Archbishop apprehended, that he was supported in his opposition to the Lambeth Articles by that great Minister; and indeed it must be admitted, that the latter did greatly object to the proceedings

* It was alleged, that they were only drawn up as exhibiting the private judgment of those concerned in them, and not as laws or decrees; but as it was enjoined that nothing should be publicly taught to the contrary, and that they should be received at Cambridge as a standard of belief, it was difficult to regard them otherwise than in the light of a decree at least.

† He had read the Divinity Lecture at Cambridge for above twenty-four years, and never been called in question till now.

against Baro; and told the Heads of the University, very plainly, that he could not conceive their accusations against him in the way they took them. For our own parts, we must confess, that the opinions of Baro objected to, by his opponents, compared with the Lambeth Articles, exhibit so much more satisfactory and beautiful a system of Christianity, and of the attributes of the Deity, that if it were proposed to us, to subscribe to which we most approved, we should decidedly determine on the side of Baro. We could almost say, if it could be brought to such an alternative, against the Bible; for if the Calvinistic interpretations of the Bible be brought against the à priori considerations of the attributes of the Deity, we should not hesitate to say, we had rather be Deists, than Calvinistic believers.

We shall now therefore exhibit to the reader, the opposite doctrines of the Lambeth Articles, and those of Baro, beginning with the former:—

"I. Deus ab æterno prædestinavit quosdam ad vitam, et quosdam ad mortem reprobavit.

"i. e. God from all eternity predestinated some to life, and some to be condemned or abandoned to death.*

"II. Causa movens aut efficiens prædestinationis ad Vitam non est prævisio fidei, aut perseverantiæ, aut bonorum operum, aut ullius rei, quæ insit in personis prædestinatis, sed sola voluntas beneplaciti Dei.

"i.e. The moving or efficient cause of predestination to life, is no foreknowledge of the faith, perseverance, good works, or any other thing, appertaining to the persons predestinated, but the sole will and pleasure of the Deity.

"III. Prædestinatorum præfinitus et certus numerus est, qui nec augeri nec minui potest.

"i.e. The number of the predestinated is predetermined and certain, and can neither be increased nor diminished.

"IV. Qui non sunt prædestinati ad salutem necessario propter peccata sua damnabuntur.

"i. e. Those who are not predestinated to salvation, will, on account of their sins, be necessarily damned.

"V. Vera, viva, justificans fides, et Spiritus Dei sanctificans, non extinguitur, non excidit, non evanescit in electis, aut finaliter aut totaliter.

* It is difficult to express these things clearly, ad mortem reprobavit, means, in truth, that those who are not predestinated to life, are in the condition of reprobates through the sin of Adam, and therefore doomed to hell, and all its perpetuity of torments!

"i. e. A true, lively, justifying faith, and the sanctifying Spirit of God, is not quenched, does not fail, or be lost in the elect finally or totally.

"VI. Homo vere fidelis, id est, fide justificante præditus, certus est plerophoriâ fidei, de remissione peccatorum suorum, et salute sempiterna sua per Christum.

"i. e. A truly faithful man, that is, one possessed of justifying faith, is certain, through the abundance of his faith, of the remission of his sins, and of his eternal salvation through Christ.

"VII. Gratia salutaris non tribuitur, non communicatur, non conceditur universis hominibus, qua servari possint si voluerint.

"i. e. A saving grace is not granted, communicated, or vouchsafed to all men, so as they can be saved, if they desire it.

"VIII. Nemo potest venire ad Christum, nisi datum ei fuerit, et nisi Pater eum traxerit. Et omnes homines non trahuntur à Patre, ut veniant ad Filium.

"i. e. No man can come to Christ, unless it be given to him, or unless the Father draw him, and all men are not drawn by the Father, that they may come to the Son.

"IX. Non est positum in arbitrio aut potestate unius cujusque hominis servari.

"i. e. It is not in the will or power of any man to be saved."

Such were the famous Lambeth Articles, afterwards attempted to be amalgamated with the Church Articles, as "the nine assertions orthodoxal."*

Let us now compare the opinions of Baro, as denounced by the Heads of the University, as perfectly false doctrine.

"I. Docuit, Deum omnes et singulos absoluta voluntate ad vitam æternam creasse. Ratio. Creavit omnes ad suam imaginem. Ergo ad beatam vitam. Ac proinde neminem rejicit à salute, nisi ob peccatum superveniens.

"i. e. He taught, that God by a free and absolute will created all men and singular, to eternal life. The reason. He created all men after his own image. Therefore to the enjoyment of a happy life. Therefore he excludes no man from salvation, but in consequence of supervenient transgressions.

"II. Voluntatem Dei duplicem esse, viz. antecedentem, et consequentem. Antecedente quidem voluntate, Deum neminem rejicisse, alias improbasset opus suum. Ad hoc illustrandum adhibuit similitudinem Regis, Patris, Agricolæ.

* Laurence's Bampton Lectures, Notes to Sermon I.

Rex leges fert ad civium commodum. Pater non gignit filium ad patibulum, aut ut exhæredet. Agricola non serit arborem, ut eradicet.

"i. e. That the will of God is two-fold, viz. antecedent and consequent. By his will antecedent, God rejected no man, had it been otherwise, he would have traversed his own work. In illustration of which, he adduced the examples of a King, a Father, and an Husbandman. A King enacts no laws but for the good of his people. A Father begets a son, not to bring him to the gallows or disinherit him. An Husbandman does not plant trees merely to pull them up again by the root.

"III. Christum mortuum esse pro omnibus et singulis: ut omnes et singuli servient se in Christo remedium habere; juxta illud, Christus venit ad servandum quod perierat. Omnes autem et singuli perierant in Adamo: ergo, &c. Nam remedium æque late patere atque morbum; et Deum non esse προσωπολήπτην.

"i. e. That Christ died for all and singular; that all and singular might know that in Christ they had a remedy [for sin], according to that which is written, Christ came to save that which was lost; but all and singular were lost in Adam; therefore, &c. For the remedy was to extend as far as the disease; and that God was no respecter of persons.

"IV. Promissiones Dei ad vitam universales esse; et æque spectare ad Cainam atque Abelem, Esauum atque Jacobum, Judam atque Petrum. Et Cainum non magis a Deo fuisse rejectum quàm Abelem; ante quam se excluserat. Homines se excludere à cælo, non Deum: Juxta illud, 'Perditio tua, ex te, Israel.'

"i. e. That God's promises of life [eternal] are universal, and had respect as much to Cain as to Abel, to Esau as to Jacob, to Judas as to Peter; and Cain was no more rejected by God than Abel, until he excluded himself; that men exclude themselves from Heaven, not God; according to what is said, 'O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself'.—Hosea, xiii. 9."

These were the doctrines that gave offence at Cambridge at this time, and were the occasion of finally driving the Professor from that University; though he retained many friends there to the last, and had he chosen to solicit a renewal of his appointment in 1596,* it is thought, that the Lambeth Articles had so strengthened his party against the Elect, that he would undoubtedly have been re-chosen, especially as Lord Burghley had of his own authority as Chancellor, discountenanced the proceedings against him, with no slight intimation, that he judged his propositions to be consistent with the truth.*

But for further particulars, we must refer the reader to Strype's Life of Whitgift, with the several papers in the Appendix; and to the article Baro, in the Biographia Britannica. The case is the more applicable to our purpose, as having apparently led to the discovery of some of Lord Burghley's private opinions upon these heads, which have been called in question by other writers. Baro particularly submitted not only his case, but his opinions, to the judgment of his noble patron, in a long Latin letter, to be seen in the Appendix to the Life of Whitgift, b. iv. No. xxviii.; and in avowing the doctrines for which he had been accused to him, he says, "Quæ tamen ego ingenue (ut me coram tanto, tamque illustri, docto et religioso viro loquentem decet) profiteor me dixisse; et vera adhuc, immo, nostræ, hoc est Christianæ, religionis fundamentum esse, credo;"† and he only implores his interposition, upon a hope that it would appear to the Chancellor that he had delivered the truth. "Et si verum dixisse comperiar, quod spero, obstare velis, quo minus hic quicquam gravius contra me statuit Dom. Procancellarius."

Towards the close of this year, the Fellows of St. John's College, Cambridge, Lord Burghley's own College, had occasion to apply to him, as Chancellor, to obtain permission to proceed to the election of a Master without interruption from the Court, upon which occasion his Lordship wrote to his son, now become his representative at Court, to the following effect:—

"To my very loving son, Sir Robert Cecil, Knight, of her Majesty's Privy Council, December 7, 1595.

"The bearers hereof are two of the Senior Fellows of St. John's College in Cambridge, who brought me the letter included (signed by twenty-three of the company), which you may read, and thereby the cause of their writing to me, as being the Chancellor of the University, may appear very reasonable and just, which is, to suffer and to help the College, according to their statutes, to have liberty to make a free choice of a Master, without being impeached (as the statutes confirmed by her Majesty do warrant), of any inhibition by any superior power. This their manner of election has been always used, and is most convenient for concord, and to avoid factions.

"My request is, that if you shall find any intention in her Majesty, upon any sinister suit, to prefer any other than the voices of the company shall freely choose, to beseech her Majesty, that at My suit, (being their Chancellor, and having been wholly brought up there from my age of fourteen years, and now the only person living of that age and education;) the statutes of the College (to which all that are electors are sworn) may not now be broken; as I hope her Majesty will not in her honour and conscience do.

"I myself have no purpose to prefer any; and yet I have some interest herein, being a poor benefactor of that College, to which I have insured lands to increase the commons of the scholars there from seven-pence to twelve-pence a-week; and so hath your mother also given a benefit of perpetuity.

"If her Majesty should, by private labour, be otherwise moved, I pray you offer to her the letter to be read from the College.

"Your loving father, W. Burghley."

"This foul weather holdeth me back from comfort of recovery."

A few months afterwards, Lord Burghley appears to have had occasion to apologise through his son, for differing occasionally from the Queen's judgment; which he did, in the following terms:—

"To my loving son, Sir Robert Cecil, Knight.

"I do hold, and will always, this course, in such matters as I differ in opinion from her Majesty. As long as I may be allowed to give advice, I will not change my opinion by affirming the contrary; for that were to offend God, to whom I am sworn first; but as a servant, I will obey her Majesty's commandment, and no-wise contrary the same; presuming that she, being God's chief minister here, it shall be God's will to have her commandments obeyed; after that, I have performed my duty as a Counsellor, and shall, in my heart, wish her commandments to have such good successes as, I am sure, she intendeth.

"You see I am in a mixture of divinity and policy; preferring, in policy, her Majesty before all others on the earth; and in divinity, the King of Heaven above all betwixt Alpha and Omega. Your loving Father,

"March 13, 1595-6." "William Burghley."

We cannot omit to refer back to the answer said to have been returned by his Lordship to Queen Mary, when she offered to reinstate him as Secretary of State at the commencement of her reign; vol. i. pp. 550, 551. The letter above agrees so exactly in point of sentiment and feeling with that answer, as greatly to corroborate the truth of the latter, which some, without sufficient reason, in our estimation, have been disposed to question.

This year was a busy year for Essex, and one entirely suited to his character, and thirst after military glory, though the first call for his services terminated in a disappointment; for the Spaniards in the Low Countries under the command of Albert, Archduke of Austria (and Cardinal), the new governor, having laid siege to Calais, so awakened the Queen to a sense of her danger (the report of the ordnance being heard to Greenwich), that an army was raised with extraordinary expedition, and committed to Essex as General; before it could be embarked, however, accounts were received of the surrender of both the town and castle. But the excitement did not subside; such formidable reports were raised of the Spaniards' preparations for invading both England and Ireland,* and perhaps Scotland, that it was resolved to attack him in his own ports; to which end a large fleet and army was speedily got ready, and placed under the command of the Lord Admiral Howard, and Essex, who spared not their own private fortunes to quicken the expedition. The instructions delivered to the commanders, with the names of those who served under them, may be seen in Camden; in the judgment of some, it appeared hazardous to leave the nation so exposed, especially, in case by any chance, the fleet itself should be encountered by a superior force. In the month of June, however, the whole sailed from Plymouth, directly for Cadiz, where they arrived on the 20th to the great surprise of the Spaniards; Essex was all on fire to begin operations, but met with some check from the Lord Admiral and Sir Walter Raleigh; at length however the action began, and nothing could exceed the impetuous bravery displayed by Essex, both by sea and land. The details of this destructive attack must be read elsewhere; the loss to the Spaniards was estimated at more than twenty millions of ducats; Essex was for remaining where he was, and keeping possession of Cadiz, which he undertook to defend with only 400 men, and three months' provisions; but he was over-ruled, as he also was in his further proposals to undertake other conquests before they returned home, but the generality of the officers employed appeared to be anxious to secure what they had got; at all events, Essex's ardour appeared to want moderating. "The Lord Admiral," says Camden, "was with good advisement joined with Essex, to moderate his youthful heat, his swelling affectation of glory, and the fortitude of his invincible courage never sufficiently to be commended, with advised discretion, and a prudent expectation of the right season for action, which are taken for prime parts of military discipline." Essex's own account of the result of the expedition, which Camden has also inserted in his history, is extremely good, but not sufficiently connected with this memoir to be inserted here.* The Queen was pleased with what had been achieved against her great enemy on his own ground, and very graciously received the commanders and other officers on their return.

* It was probably upon this occasion, that a paper was written by one of the English fugitives at Douay, which, to do all parties justice as far as we can, deserves we think to be mentioned. It will be found in the Appendix to the third vol. of Strype's Annals, No. lxv. It was found among Lord Burghley's papers, thus indorsed by his Lordship: "Argumenta cujusdam papistæ, nomine Wryght." But the paper itself which was written in Latin, was inscribed, "An licitum sit Catholicis in Angliâ arma sumere, et aliis modis Reginam et regnum defendere contra Hispanos?" The writer, with much show of impartiality, enumerates the offences severally given to each other, by the two Courts; and so skilfully weighs all the circumstances that might be thrown into the balance on either side, concluding loyally in the decision, that Elizabeth's Catholic subjects ought rather to defend her and her kingdom against Spanish invaders, as very well to deserve a careful perusal. It contains besides, many historical remarks of considerable importance, and concludes with a very reasonable doubt of Philip's sincerity; and whether in fact, his purposes were to invade England for religion, or for rule? a very just doubt.—It might have been added, whether, to revenge the death of Mary of Scotland (his last pretence), or to take advantage of her death, in asserting his own claims to the inheritance of the English crown?—In Birch's Memoirs, mention is made of a Mr. Wright, a Jesuit, who had procured leave through Essex's means to visit his friends in the north, to the alarm of Archbishop Hutton, who wrote both to the Lord Treasurer and Lord Essex about him, fearing his practices. This seems to be a different man from the writer of the letter, who was probably the Dr. Wryght, alias Dobson, mentioned among the recusants beyond seas, as resident at Douay in 1587.—Strype, iii. Appendix, book ii. No. lxvi.

Essex however sustained two disappointments, which seemed greatly to offend his ambitious and proud spirit; the Queen conferred the government of the town of Brill in the Low Countries, on Sir Francis Vere, contrary to his wishes,

* A short account of the same may be seen in Strype's Annals, iv. No. ccviii. drawn up by Captain Price, and addressed to the Lord Treasurer, concluding, "Thus being bold to trouble your honour, with all humble duty I shall continually pray to God, even from the very depth of my heart, to send your Lordship good health, that your days may be prolonged, to the great comfort of all your friends." Dated Cales, June 28, 1596.

and made Sir Robert Cecil her Secretary,* much more to his discontentment, as he had laboured hard to procure the place for Sir Thomas Bodley; and by the same low arts, which accorded little with his soldier's heart, namely, that of first seeking to withdraw Bodley from his connexion with the Cecils; and secondly, by disparaging his competitor Sir Robert Cecil, in such a manner to the Queen, as to offend her greatly, and do Bodley no good; for, as Camden writes, he so over-acted his part in such manœuvres, that she "began now actually to disapprove of those men whom he [Essex] most commended;" in which, considering his gross disparagement of others, she seemed to judge or at least to decide rightly. Both Bodley and Davison (whom also he tried to serve), suffered probably from his arbitrary manner of forcing them upon others, or advancing them at the cost of others.†

As the disaster that had befallen the Spaniard, did not appear to have entirely checked his designs against England and Ireland, but rather to have provoked him to a renewal of his preparations, the Queen judged it expedient to enter into a more formal treaty with France, of mutual help and assistance, to which all other States, exposed to the vengeance or ambition of Philip, were to be invited to accede. Such a treaty, therefore, was entered into, and soon concluded, and sworn to by both Sovereigns, on an interchange of special envoys to that end. Elizabeth, on the 29th of August, being sworn, in her own chapel at Greenwich, before the Duc de Bouillon, Marshal of France; and Henry, at Paris, before Gilbert, Earl of Shrewsbury, assisted by Sir Anthony Mildmay, who was sent

* Sir Robert was made Secretary, on the 5th of July; and to shew how obnoxious this was to the Essex party, and how rudely and ungraciously the elder Bacon could express himself on his promotion, he wrote to his friend, "Elephas peperit, so that now the old man may say with the rich man in the gospel, requiescat anima mea."—And what old man in Lord Burghley's place and situation, might not reasonably rejoice to have a son treading so closely in his steps?—Miss Aikin, in her Court of Elizabeth, has, with good judgment, expressed the same feelings, ch. xxv.

† Sir Thomas Bodley has told this whole story so well and so ingenuously, with his own pen, that we cannot help referring to it, as it may be read in the Article appropriated to him, in the Biographia Britannica, Note G; we need scarcely say, that it vindicates the Cecils from all imputation of malice, and plainly shews that they entertained a just respect for Sir Thomas's talents and character; though Essex, by his lavish praises of the one party, and abuse of the other, had done all he could to set them at variance; fortunately, these jealousies at Court, induced Sir Thomas to seek retirement from all public employments, and led to the foundation, or rather reparation and fresh endowment, of that library at Oxford, which has since immortalized his name; and for an account of which, we must again refer to the Biographia Britannica.

to invest the King with the ensigns of the Order of St. George; the Queen being desirous of having him enrolled among its members, as a "Prince highly renowned for military glory," in regard to which there could, indeed, be no dispute.*

Lord Burghley, as usual, seems to have been occupied, at this time, in drawing up memorials, Nov. 4, 1596, concerning the Spanish preparations, which are to be seen in Strype's Annals, vol. iv. Nos. cxcii. cxciii.; the latter, though of an earlier date than the other, being drawn up by the Lord Treasurer, and marked with his own hand, as "A publication of the Queen's Majesty's commandment to the generals of her navy, to offend no manner of persons of any other nation, but the subjects of the King of Spain, her Majesty's enemy; or such as shall manifestly aid the said King for the intended invasion of the Queen's Majesty's dominions." This was, in fact, a draft of the declaration to be made by those generals, the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Howard, Admiral.

In addition, however, to these memorials and declarations, all supposed to be drawn up by the venerable Lord Treasurer himself, we find in Strype's Collections, a prayer of thanksgiving, composed by him, for the Queen's success. It is dated July 3, 1596, and might well deserve to be preserved among other occasional devotions of the same character and description. [Annals, iv. No. cxciv.] We cannot say so much for a most extraordinary prayer penned by her Majesty, 1597, and to be seen in the same collection, No. ccxxxiii.†

Among the deaths this year, are to be noted those of the Lord Keeper Puckering; Fletcher, Bishop of London; the Lord Hunsdon; Sir Francis Knollys; and the Earl of Huntingdon, President of the Council in the North.

Of the above, Sir Francis Knollys seems, as nearly as possible, to have begun his career of life and acquaintance, at Court, with Lord Burghley; having been

* Otherwise Henry did certainly not appear to deserve this high distinction, as he soon deviated from the terms of the treaty, by privately and separately entering into negotiations with Spain.

† The Queen appears to have suffered from illness at this time. The following being to be found amongst the letters addressed by Lord Burghley to his son, Sir Robert, November 14, 1596: "I was advertised this evening, by my Lord Chamberlain's letter, that her Majesty deferred her remove unto Wednesday, which is the very day of her access to the crown; and now, by your letter, I perceive the like, being right sorry for the cause; and, therefore, I pray you, let her Majesty know, that I do send to hear of her Majesty's amendment, for, by her impediment to order her affairs, all her realm shall suffer detriment. I have not been idle since you went, having (though not profaned this Sabbath day), made it a full working day, such is the importunity of suitors. "W. BURGHLEY."

early introduced to the notice of Henry VIII., at which time he embraced Protestantism, continuing in the royal household all Edward's reign; and, to avoid the persecutions under Mary, retiring, with many others, to foreign parts, where, meeting with Knox, he became a regular Puritan. "Being, perhaps," says Mr. Lodge, "the first Englishman of note who espoused that wayward sect." Mr. Lodge adds, that "Elizabeth, to whom his hatred of Popery sufficiently recommended him, gave him the Order of the Garter, and in 1566, appointed him Vice Chamberlain, &c." All this is probably true, but we cannot help noticing one circumstance insisted upon; namely, that Knollys, a thorough Puritan, should have recommended himself to Elizabeth, by his hatred of Popery. Now the Queen could not bear Puritans, and the Puritans looked upon the Queen as being no better than a Papist. It may do more credit to both to conclude, that, as Mr. Lodge adds, it was his honesty recommended him. Elizabeth herself, he tells us, used to say that she promoted Sir Francis Knollys because he was an honest man; a rare compliment, if it be true, as reported, that in conversation with the celebrated William Lambard, commonly called the Perambulator, that sagacious Princess observed to him, that in past times, "Force and arms did prevail; but now the wit of the fox is every where on foot, so as hardly a faithful or virtuous man may be found." In which her Majesty seems to have been sadly in the right.—See Nichols's Progresses, vol. iii. p. 553, where may also be seen, p. 554, a long letter from Mr. Lambard to Lord Burghley, on the affairs of the Netherlands, 1585, beginning in the following remarkable manner:—

"My Right Honourable good Lord,

"Seguis was with me this morning, to take his leave, discontented, but confessing that you alone had dealt most honourable for his King; which he would not only publish here, but assure his King that you were the sole personage to whom affairs ought to be addressed."

Of Bishop Fletcher we have had occasion to speak elsewhere. It is well known that he gave great displeasure to Queen Elizabeth, on his becoming Bishop of London, by marrying; a Romish prejudice she could never overcome. His death was the occasion of a most curious epitaph being written, preserved by Sir John Harrington; a specimen of the bad taste of the times, only to be matched, if matched at all, by the following on Lord Chancellor Audley, who died in 1544, and which we therefore put first:—

The stroke of death's inevitable dart,
Hath now, alas! of life bereft the heart
Of Sir Thomas Audley, of the Garter Knight, Late Chancellor of England, under our Prince of might,
Henry the Eighth, worthy of high renown,
And made him Lord Audley of this town.

Bishop Fletcher's is, fortunately, not quite so long:—

Here lies the first Prelate, made Christendome see,
A Bishop, a husband unto a ladee;
The cause of his death was secret and hid,
He cried out I die, and e'en so he did!

Of Lord Hunsdon's death we must speak a little more at large, copying from Mr. Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, the following story:—"In 1688, Mr. Samuel Johnson published a book, entitled Purgatory proved by Miracles [a good burlesque upon that doctrine], collected out of Roman Catholic writers; wherein, p. 36, he hath this passage: In the year 1596, the Baron of Hunsdon (who had been formerly of Elizabeth, the Queen of England's Council) falling dangerously ill, saw, entering into his chamber, six of the principal officers of this kingdom, who died a little before, and had, as well as he, been cruel persecutors of the Catholic religion. They appeared almost all surrounded in flames, and, in that dismal state, drawing near his bed, they bade him acquaint William Cecil (one of the accomplices of their impieties and violences), that, in a little time, he should descend into hell, there, with them, to suffer the punishment due to so many crimes. After they were vanished, the sick man related the vision he had had, and affirmed, with oaths, that it was no reverie, but a certain truth. Nevertheless, he did not avail himself of it, for, instead of employing the remainder of his life in doing fruits worthy of penitence, he died some few days after in his error and in his sin. Cecil quickly followed him, God having snatched him out of the world by a death as fatal as it was sudden and unforeseen." Le Pedagog. Christ. p. 263. "They who can believe these things," says the learned Editor, "may: to me they only shew how heartily the Papists hated the Lord Burghley." He might have added, that nothing could be less sudden, or more foreseen, than Lord Burghley's departure from this world, as we shall soon have to shew.

We are now arrived so nigh to the last cares and labours of the venerable statesman,* whose life we undertook to write, that we cannot help feeling some unwillingness to make him a party to the intrigues and jealousies which began at this time to disturb the Court, through the restlessness and ambition of Essex, whose bravery it is impossible not to admire; though, had it but been tempered with more prudence and discretion, and displayed with a less degree of self-confidence and contempt of others, it would assuredly have shone brighter than we can justly admit to have been the case. Certain it is, that nothing but his bravery could be expected to breed respect in the minds, either of the elder or the younger Cecil, since it was notorious that, though, he had been under great obligations to the former, he was endeavouring all he could to raise a party against them, not of new or unconnected persons, but of such as had served with them, been obliged by them, or who even stood in a near degree of relationship. But Lord Burghley was retiring from this scene of envy and detraction, prepared, indeed, to surrender the reins of government into the hands of a no less eminent statesman, in the person of his own son; and who shall say that it was not natural, in the aged and tried Counsellor, of such a Princess as Elizabeth, to be anxious to prevent a son so talented, and so schooled in the politics, not of England alone, but of Europe at large, being overpowered or driven from his post, by men of less experience, and more suspicious characters, however eminent or conspicuous in other respects? For we are far from wishing to deny, that Essex had attached to him many persons of knowledge and capacity, particularly the two Bacons, who appear not merely to have acquired, but to have inherited, both paternally and maternally, as well as the Cecils, qualifications for business, and a reach and extent of understanding exceedingly extraordinary.†

* How much Lord Burghley's bodily infirmities were increasing, we may judge from two passages in his letters to his son, in September and October of this year, printed by Peck. In one he writes, "Though my body be this very day at the period of iiixx.xvii years (77), and, therefore, far unable to travel either with my body or with lively spirits, yet I find myself so bound with the superabundant kindness of her Majesty, in dispensing with my disabilities, as, God permitting me, I will be at Westminster to-morrow, in the afternoon, ready to attend my Lords. Sol in Libra, 13th September, 1597." To another letter, October 12, he subjoins the following postscript, in his own hand-writing, the letter itself being written by another: "I am worse since my physic, being now Μονοποδες and Μονοχειρ, but not Monoculus," i. e. disabled in one foot and one hand, but having, however, the use of both eyes.

† Having had occasion to speak of the early competition between Francis Bacon and the celebrated Sir Edward Coke, for the post of Attorney-General, we ought not perhaps to omit all notice

But we must turn to consider what particular events occurred to mark the year 1597. The nation appeared to be in a great state of activity, and Essex a leading man in all such proceedings; anxious to baffle, in every way, the enterprises of Spain, and enrich his country with the spoils of her great and angry foe. But, as happened in the memorable year 1588, the elements seemed to take a part in the strife, or, in other and more proper terms, Providence appeared again to interpose, by storms and tempests, to defeat the objects of the hostile armaments on both sides, but particularly in preventing the descent of the Spaniards on England: for, though Philip had undoubtedly suffered much loss at Cadiz, he had other ships and fleets at his command, particularly at Lisbon, and which he soon put into a state which encouraged him in the hope of still successfully invading England or Ireland, and revenging the affronts he had so lately received. Ferrol and Corunna were fixed upon as good stations, from which he might make his attacks; but his first attempts were entirely defeated by a storm, which dispersed his ships on their passage, and compelled him to relinquish his plans. Essex, in the mean while, contemplated two bold attempts to interrupt his proceedings, and diminish his powers; he planned, by sailing to the Azores, to intercept his treasures from America, and to make an attack upon his armament at Corunna, in order again to disable him, in the moment of preparation, as had been the case at Cadiz. Essex had vowed to defeat the Spaniard, or perish in the attempt. All the preparations for this first assault upon England's inveterate foe, were splendid and magnificent; volunteers of the highest rank, "with their feathers waving, and richly habited in gaudy cloaths," as Camden describes them, repaired to Plymouth, to take part in the expedition; but scarcely had they got forty leagues from the harbour, before they were attacked by a mighty tempest, which compelled them to return home, seeking shelter wherever the winds or the waves happened to direct their course.* On their

of a subsequent competition between them, for the hand of a rich widow of the house of Burghley; the Lady Hatton, daughter of Sir Thomas Cecil, Lord Burghley, first Earl of Exeter. In this instance also Coke succeeded, but not much to the increase either of his credit or his comfort. A most extraordinary dispute between himself and his Lady, about the disposal of their daughter in marriage, betrayed, at once, the imperious character of the great "oracle of the law," and the cold indifference with which he would have bartered his daughter's happiness for Court favour. The case is to be found in M. d'Israeli's Second Series of the Curiosities of Literature, vol. i.

* It seems to have been while these things were passing at Plymouth, that that very extraordinary scene took place at the Court between the Queen and the Polish minister, well and sufficiently described by Camden, but more minutely and circumstantially, perhaps, in a letter from return, contrary winds, for a long time, prevented their renewing their operations; and when, at length, they were able to sail, and were pursuing their course to the northern or western coasts of Spain, another storm arose, which caused a separation of the fleet, and terminated in a disagreement between two of the chivalrous knights of the day, Essex and Raleigh; leading to disappointments and errors which Camden calls, or is inclined to call, voluntary and wilful, as "wrought by some men's emulations amongst themselves, whilst they endeavoured to prevent each other of a little glory." The Spaniards, in the mean while, put to sea, and might have fallen in the way of the English returning from the Azores; but here again another tempest occurred, and scattered the ships of both nations all the sea over, so that neither the English saw the Spaniards, nor the Spaniards the English; and thus, as Camden concludes his account of these expeditions, "Almighty God, the umpire of wars, kept asunder these two nations, who were hastening to the slaughter of one another; and their designs were, on both sides, at this time disappointed." It is impossible for us to deviate so far from our course, as to enter farther into the details of these extraordinary expeditions. Camden alone may supply the particulars; or, in rather a shorter compass, Rapin. Mad^lle^. Keralio dwells much upon the incidents of these adverse proceedings by sea.

Sir Robert Cecil to Essex, written by the Queen's own desire, from Greenwich, July 26, 1597, and which may be seen in Mr. Ellis's valuable collection of Original Letters, vol. iii. No. ccxxxiv. The story is too well known to be insisted upon here, though, after the severe reproof of the Ambassador by the Queen, in a very extraordinary extempore Latin speech, Lord Burghley was placed at the head of the Committee appointed to confer more privately with him. Speed's account of the conclusion of the scene is short enough to be transcribed. "The Queen," says the old historian, "lion like, rising, daunted the malapert orator, no less with her stately port and majestical deporture, than with the tartness of her princely checks; and, turning to the train of her attendants, thus said, 'God's death, my Lords (for that was ever her oath in anger), I have been enforced this day to scoure up my old Latin, that hath lain long in rusting.'" The Latin speech may be seen in Nichols, vol. iii. 417. Another Ambassador came also this year from the King of Denmark, who, among other things, communicated to her Majesty the desire his master had to mediate a peace between England and Spain. To which the Queen, in reply, is reported to have observed, that she thought the King, his master, was too young to know the cause of the breach of the league between her and Spain; and as it was not broken by her consent, nor by any of hers, so it should not be sued nor sought for by her, nor any in her behalf: "For," said she, "know now, and be it known to the King your master, and all Princes, christened or heathen, that the Queen of England hath no need to crave peace; for, I assure you," said she, "that I never endured one hour of fear since my first coming to my kingdom and subjects."

It was not until late in the autumn that Essex, having at length reached England, with his "leaky, torn, and weather-beaten" ships, returned to Court, where he met with a fresh mortification to his aspiring mind; the Queen having, in his absence, created the Lord Howard, Earl of Nottingham; and in the Patent inserted that it was for his services to his country in 1588, and afterwards in taking the town of Cadiz, jointly with the Earl of Essex. It does no credit to Essex, that he was jealous and envious to so great a degree, of the honours conferred on so eminent a man as Lord Howard; but what he most resented was, that as Lord High Admiral the new Earl had precedence of him. This difficulty, however, was soon settled, by the Queen's making Essex Earl Marshal of England, which preserved to him the precedence of the Lord High Admiral,* and gave him rank next to the Great Chamberlain.

This year put an end to the celebrated association of foreign merchants, known by the name of the Still, or Steel-yard Merchants, of whom we had much to say in our first volume, under the reign of Edward VI., and which need not therefore be repeated. They seemed very loath to part with their privileges granted to them of old time, though it could not be unreasonable to break through such monopolies in the hands of foreigners, when the native subjects of the realm had become entirely competent to carry on their own business, and conduct their own trade. Their gain and profits had indeed, in times past, been very great, through the ignorance, supineness, and incapacity of the English people at large, and more encouragement from those who could borrow their money, than was consistent with the good of the nation. Lord Burghley was among the first to discover the error of this system, and to endeavour to rouse his countrymen to a sense of their own power and capabilities, and to shake off the yoke of foreign dependence, and he now lived to see the termination of the whole of their exclusive privileges. They made claims to what, in all reason, could be no longer endured, and when refused, procured the Emperor to forbid the English traffic throughout Germany; but Elizabeth, who would never brook any affronts, immediately commanded the Lord Mayor to put those of the Hanse Towns out of possession of all the houses they had in the Steel-yard, and it was some time before the differences could be entirely settled by negotiation, other grievances being mixed up with their complaints and claims.—For an account of the Steel-yard, and Guildhalda Teutonicorum, see Pennant's London.

* Camden speaks of another offence given to Essex at this time, by the Queen's making Sir Robert Cecil Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which the Editor of his History corrects, by observing that it was a mistake for the Mastership of the Wards. But this is itself a mistake, for Sir Robert was not made Master of the Wards until the year 1599, after his father's death. Sir Robert, however, was too much a friend to Raleigh, not to stand upon worse terms than ever with Essex, after the late quarrel between the two Commanders.

But to return.—That Lord Burghley continued a Minister of State to the latest period of his life, may in a great degree be attributed to the unwillingness of Elizabeth to release him from such cares; but other cares appear also to have pressed upon him to the last; for in this year, as may be seen in Strype, he had to mediate between the University and town of Cambridge, and was particularly appealed to, to decide between that extraordinary scholar, Hugh Broughton, and his several opponents, not excepting the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had fallen under his great displeasure, and towards whom Broughton seems to have kept no measures, in his correspondence with the Lord Treasurer. He seems to have regarded all other learned men as pigmies in literature, compared with himself, and to have highly resented the little notice taken of him; and indeed he was put to some trials this year by the appointment of Bancroft to the See of London, and the translation of Bilson from Worcester to Winchester; but his complaints were written in such a style, not only to the Lord Treasurer, but to the Queen herself, as to amount almost to a disqualification for the posts he solicited; learning, without discretion, being oftentimes an hindrance rather than a help to persons in such conspicuous and commanding situations as Bishops. At all events, his two competitors in the instances above were, to say the least, far more unexceptionable, if not indeed specially qualified to fill the Sees assigned to them. The Lord Treasurer, however, had much to do in quieting these altercations, and moderating the disputes on foot. The letters written by Broughton to his Lordship are very remarkable, and may be seen in the Appendix to Strype's Life of Whitgift.

One controversy, to which Lord Burghley's attention was particularly called this year, was upon a topic so little likely in these days to be referred to a Lord Treasurer to decide, as to deserve to be mentioned as a further proof of the continual deference paid to his judgment and discretion. Not only was he appealed to by Broughton, but by his learned and Right Reverend opponent Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, to judge between them upon the question of our Lord's descent into Hell; and we find it recorded as matter of fact, that a large discourse, with many quotations from the Fathers, was particularly drawn up at this time for the Lord Treasurer's use, to shew the sense of the learned upon the article of the Descent, and which is still preserved among the Burghley Papers, marked with his own hand, "De descensu Christi ad Inferos, March 12, 1597." The writer, in the conclusion of his discourse, hath these words; "Hæc ego Dominationis tuæ jussu, tantum de multiplici expositione hujus articuli, Descendit ad Inferos, propono. Tuæ erit sapientiæ, pro summo tuo judicio, de eisdem, prout videbitur æquissimum statuere." More of this may be seen in Strype's Life of Whitgift, b. iv. ch. xxi., and in the Biographia Britannica, art. Broughton.

A case occurred also in Ireland this year, which equally may serve to shew the deference paid to his Lordship, to the latest moment of his life, as a friend to the established Church. The story will be best told by a regular transcript of the following letter from Adam Loftus, Archbishop of Dublin, to the Lord Treasurer, concerning Mr. Ryder's case, who had a mandamus for the Deanery of the Cathedral Church of St. Patrick's, being no member thereof.

"It may please your Lordship,

"Immediately after the receipt of your letters, signifying her Majesty's pleasure and commandment in the behalf of Mr. Ryder to the Deanery of St. Patrick's, I assembled my Chapter, and made the same known unto them, whom I found humbly willing, according to her Majesty's pleasure, to make election of him. But forasmuch as they made a scruple to elect him, until he were a member of themselves, which they allege to be done by them in discharge of their consciences, being sworn to the form of their foundation, I have, to remove that scruple, reserved a Prebend, now void, in my gift, for Mr. Ryder, which presently upon his arrival, I will admit him unto; and have taken the hands of my Chapter thereupon to elect him; which I assure your Lordship, upon my credit (which I would not break with you for all the Deaneries and Bishoprics of Ireland), shall be done within ten days next after his coming. Whereunto I find my said Chapter the more willing (although there be among themselves as many learned graduates as belong to any one church that I know in England), because THEY ACKNOWLEDGE YOUR LORDSHIP TO BE A CHIEF PILLAR FOR THE UPHOLDING OF THEIR CHURCH.—November 29, 1597."

This testimony to the steadiness of the venerable Treasurer in defending and upholding the Established Church, is the more remarkable, because it seems to have had the effect of qualifying the irregularity of the Queen's mandamus, and to have been willingly concurred in by very learned and meritorious divines

(who might have some reason to complain of being superseded by a stranger), simply out of respect to his Lordship; and having happened in the last year of his life, deserves surely to be noted.

The Queen appears to have visited the Lord Treasurer this year at Wimbledon,* at the Manor House bought of Sir Christopher Hatton, by Sir Thomas Cecil, the Treasurer's eldest son, who rebuilt it 1588, and received a grant of the manor from the Queen, 1590, in exchange for some lands in Lincolnshire.—See Lysons' Environs, and Nichols' Progresses. Fuller calls it a "daring structure," judged by some to equal, if not exceed, Nonsuch. A view of it may be seen in Lysons, and in the tenth volume of the Archæologia. Sir Thomas, becoming afterwards Earl of Exeter, left it to his third son, Sir Edward Cecil, who was himself created a Peer, by the title of Viscount Wimbledon. The Lord Treasurer had a grant of lands there in the reign of Edward VI. and resided in the place, as has been shewn in our first volume. More of the family connexions with Wimbledon may be seen in Lysons. It is certainly remarkable, that the house at Wimbledon, which appears to have been a magnificent structure, should have been built after Burghley House, and, as it would seem, for a third son.

* Nichols, iii. 413. We rather think it refers to the visit paid to his successor in 1599.—See p. 440.

Fortieth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, began Nov. 17, 1597.

Parliament meets—Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Thomas Wilkes, and Mr. John Herbert, sent on an Embassy to France—State paper drawn up by Lord Burghley on the existing state of affairs in Europe—Henry IV.—Death of Lord Burghley—Account of him from his Life by a Domestic—Lord Buckhurst made Lord Treasurer—Extract from Sir John Harrington's Notes—Death of Philip II.—Extract from Lord Burghley's will—Of his Funeral—Inscription on his monument at Stamford—Description of the monument erected in Westminster Abbey to Lady Burghley and Lady Oxford.

Towards the close of the preceding year, such strong suspicions were entertained at Court, that the King of France, notwithstanding the league so lately concluded, was secretly entering into a treaty for peace with the Spaniard, whereby the Queen might be left to contend alone with the whole power and wealth of the latter, that it was judged right to summon a Parliament, in order to provide in time against the effects of such an abandonment, should it turn out as was then greatly expected. The two Houses accordingly met on Monday, the 24th of October, 1597, her Majesty being present, not only on that day, but on the 27th also, when the Commons had to present their new Speaker, Mr. Serjeant Yelverton ;* Sir Thomas Egerton having succeeded Sir John Puckering as Lord Keeper.

It appears from the Journal of Sir Simon D'Ewes, that notwithstanding his

* Every new chosen Speaker of the House of Commons is generally expected, with the utmost show of humility, to answer the call of the House with a speech of disqualification; but it has not been usual with them to indulge the humour of the House so far as to caricature their own persons, as this Speaker did. "Neither," he observed, "from my person or nature doth this choice arise; for he that supplieth this place, ought to be a man big and comely, stately and well-spoken,—his voice great, his carriage majestical, his nature haughty, and his purse plentiful and heavy; but contrarily, the stature of my body is small, myself not so well-spoken, my voice low, my carriage lawyer-like, and of the common fashion; my nature soft and bashful, my purse thin, light, and never yet plentiful."

very advanced age, and other infirmities; and though, as it turned out, he had not many months more to live, Lord Burghley was not only able to attend in his place, through the greatest part of this Sessions of Parliament, but to sit upon many Committees; and yet so entirely had he now outlived his early friends and acquaintance, that upon a question of customs and privileges, the case was referred, as the Journal states, "especially to the Lord Burghley, Lord Treasurer, the most ancient Parliament-man of any that were at that time present, either of the Upper House or House of Commons."*

Though this Parliament began in the year preceding, and was dissolved on the 9th of February, 1597-8, before the actual beginning of the year 1598, according to the old reckoning, yet we judge it most reasonable, as well as most conformable to our own plan, to notice its proceedings in this place; for though many good acts were passed, tending to the particular advantage of the nation, and highly acceptable and pleasing to the people, the heads of which may be seen in Camden, Rapin, and the regular Parliamentary histories, yet the chief object of its being called together undoubtedly was, to obtain for the Queen such support in the way of subsidy, as might enable her either to negotiate with Spain, for a solid and sure peace, upon strong grounds, or still to bid defiance to her most inveterate enemy, if she should be abandoned by the King of France; and so sensible does the Parliament, when assembled, appear to have been of the urgency and reasonableness of the calls made upon it, that a grant was soon agreed to of no less than three entire subsidies, and six fifteenths and tenths; and, according to the journal so often referred to, with much less debate and disputation than on any former similar occasion. The Clergy in convocation also granted three subsidies.

In the meanwhile, though the proceedings in France were much mistrusted, and it was almost become apparent to the English minister residing there, that Henry was practising secretly with Spain, insomuch that Sir Anthony Mildmay, the minister alluded to, "an open-hearted and true Englishman," as Camden calls him, "not without offence giving," actually expostulated with the King upon it, and "often taxed his Counsellors of shifting and shuffling, of unconstancy and lightness in their answers, as if they mocked and abused the English;" yet to keep up some semblance of good faith and sincerity, Henry appears to have invited the Queen to send Commissioners over to join in the negotiations going forward, not however without such limitations in point of time, &c. as seemed rather to confirm than allay the suspicions that had been previously raised; the estates of Holland were also included in this invitation. Nor was the invitation declined by either, though it was afterwards known, that Henry, "minding his own concernments," had made a private agreement with the Spaniard about a peace, which was secretly deposited in the hands of the Cardinal Archduke Albert, till a commission could be sent from Spain for its conclusion.

Though Camden and other authors have written pretty much at large of the communications which took place between the belligerents at this time, yet there are some circumstances on which we may hope to be excused for dwelling more particularly, as immediately connected with the subject of these Memoirs, and the last labours of the great man, whose life we have been professing to write.

The Ministers deputed by her Majesty to France, on this memorable occasion, were Sir Thomas Wilkes, Sir Robert Cecil,* her chief Secretary, and John Herbert, Esq., Master of Requests; but Sir Thomas Wilkes dying almost immediately upon his arrival in France, the principal weight and responsibility of the embassy devolved, of course, on Sir Robert. Of the spirited manner in which he conducted himself upon the occasion, we shall have to speak hereafter; at present, we must turn to consider the purport and contents of (probably) the last state paper ever drawn up by Lord Burghley, and which, long as it is, was written by his own hand, in the 78th year of his most laborious life, and arduous administration; remaining as a monument of his clear comprehension, at that advanced age, of the general state of Europe; of his care of his Sovereign, her country, and her allies; and of his constant desire of peace, if it could be obtained on honourable and secure grounds; containing, besides, such a statement of facts relating to the general quarrel between the two kingdoms of England and Spain, as to be highly illustrative of past as well as present events.

The paper, as printed by Strype, [Annals, iv. No. ccxlvi.] is thus entitled:

"Considerations of a motion for a Treaty of Peace with the King of Spain,

* Sir Thomas Cecil, the elder brother of Sir Robert, was a member of the House of Commons during this, as well as the preceding Parliaments, and appears to have been almost invariably chosen a Member of all special committees.

upon a motion of the French King; drawn up by the Lord Treasurer BURGHLEY, and writ by his own hand; and seems to be some of his last writings."

"If it shall be held for a certainty, that there can be no condition obtained by her Majesty, for assurance of the United Provinces to continue their estate without evident danger, to be in short time subdued to the King of Spain's absolute power, as they were in former times, then it were in vain to send any to treat for a particular peace for England: for that the Queen of England can have no assurance to continue a particular peace, except she may be also assured that the United Provinces may be free from the danger of such conquest, as by good proofs are known to have been intended at the first coming of the Duke of Alva with his armies into those countries; and so also the like purposes continued by the King of Spain's Ministers, with intention thereby to invade and conquer England.

"So if, upon these grounds, no treaty shall be convenient for England, then may the French King be answered, that though there be a commission sent for the Spaniard to treat of a peace for England, yet considering without a good accord to be made for the United Provinces, for their assurance against the former purposes of Spain, her Majesty can make no account for continuance of any peace with Spain; and for that the Deputy [Deputies] of the States have peremptorily answered the French King, that they will not, nor may, with their safety, yield their consent to hearken to a treaty with Spain; and so also, other their Deputies, being sent hither to her Majesty, do concur in the same opinion, to refuse such treaty; notwithstanding that they have been with sundry reasons moved to the contrary. Whereunto they will in no wise yield, but do rather choose to continue in their defence, earnestly urging the Queen's Majesty to continue her confederacy with them; though it hath not pleased the French King, according to the former joint league, both offensive and defensive, to perform the same, but to hearken to make a peace apart for himself; and hereupon her Majesty, considering with herself that her danger from Spain shall continue, notwithstanding any form of peace to be made by her apart, if the United Provinces shall not have a good accord with Spain; whereof they do despair, and whereof also her Majesty hath no causes of doubt, being no wise informed of any good disposition in the King of Spain's Commissioners, or in the Cardinal, to make any good accord with the United Provinces, but to the contrary, by good proof, which her Majesty hath seen in the very letters and writings between the Cardinal and the Deputies, concerning hard conditions for the States that cannot be denied.

"And so upon these former reasons, her Majesty may with honour, and without misliking of the French King, impart these reasons to him, why her Majesty cannot with her safety accept any treaty for peace with Spain, except she may also see the States better assured of a peace than she seeth a disposition thereto on their part. And so the King may be thanked for his intercession made, for his obtaining of the commission from Spain; but to require him that his Commissioners may be directed to inform the Spanish deputies upon what grounds, and for what reasons, for this time her Majesty will forbear to send any Commissioners to treat of any peace with the King of Spain, except she may be more certainly informed how the United Provinces shall continue in surety from their manifest dangers of subversion."

Next follows what is called, "A consideration of a second course to be held for a Treaty." (As the Paper is very long, we shall abridge where we can do it, without injury to the writer or the cause.)

"Considering an offer is made by a sufficient commission from the King of Spain, to treat with her Majesty of a peace, and that it is to be confessed of all Christians, that where peace may be had, there the refusal thereof, by continuing of war, will displease Almighty God, who is a God of peace, and an avenger by way of war, and for that no war can be ended by form of a peace without treaty; and conference to be had by Ministers thereto authorized. Therefore there is great reason to authorize and send some convenient number of persons, of respective qualities, to join with the Spanish deputies to treat hereof, according as they shall be instructed from her Majesty to enter into the same, with due respect to her honour.—And for the prosecution of this purpose for sending, answer would be sent to the French King, that according to his request reported by her Ambassador, her Majesty's Secretary, to be advertised within forty days, from the coming away of the Ambassador, whether her Majesty would consent to send her Commissioners to treat with the Spaniards, her Majesty hath yielded to with some difficulty, how to resolve, and to return answer within that number of days, considering of those forty days there were * * * * * days past before her Ambassador, or any from him, could come into England; partly by the long and tedious journey he had from Nantes through Bretagne to the sea-side, to take his passage into England, which he adventured against all favourable winds, &c.—But at his coming, being informed of the French King's earnestness to have answer within forty days, her Majesty weighing the cause to be of great weight, as it is, either to proceed, or of so short time to consider thereof, having a mind not to be noted in the world to refuse to live in peace, being offered, neither yet to fear her enemy, that shall refuse to accord to reasonable conditions, she hath yielded to send certain Commissioners into France, to some convenient place; to meet with such as shall be authorized by the King of Spain, &c.—She therefore requireth of the French King—That she may know who shall be authorized on the Spanish part to treat; for it is not convenient that any authorized by the Pope, as either the Legate, the Nuncio, or any other, be admitted to be participant in this treaty, which properly belongeth but to the King of Spain, and the Queen of England; except the French King shall offer to name some of his Council as indifferent persons, to further the treaty by reasonable motions to both parties, to have a copy of the King's Commission, &c. And that a place indifferent may be named for meeting, as near in some parts of Picardy as may be to the sea-side, &c."—

Then follow the instructions to be given to the Queen's Commissioners:

As first, the interchangeable view of the commissions on both parts, with leave to deliver some speeches by way of preface, to declare the Queen's sincerity, and report the course of her Majesty's dealing in the business; [the particulars of which must be copied at length, to explain past proceedings.] "Being, by a message sent by one of the French King's Council, named M. de Mezzy (or de Maisse),* informed, that the French King had an offer from the King of Spain to treat with him for a peace, and that the Cardinal had authority so to do, and also to treat with her Majesty; and therefore, considering he was bound by a league both with her Majesty and the States of the United Provinces to continue the war against the King of Spain, the common enemy, he required the Queen's Majesty to certify him whether she would make choice to continue the war, or to hearken to peace; for thereto would he conform himself in answering the Cardinal. To this her Majesty made answer, that she had cause to doubt, that though this offer to the French King to make peace with him might have warrant, but yet for any treaty for peace to be offered to her Majesty, she understood of no good warrant from the King of Spain; and when de Mezzy said that he thought that the Cardinal might have authority: then her Majesty, to increase her doubt of insufficient dealing, called to remembrance, and so told M. de Mezzy, how deceitfully she had been used by the King of Spain, in the year 1588, to take advantage of her, by offering her by the Duke of Parma, both by sundry messages and letters, that he was authorized by the King of Spain to treat for a peace; whereon the said Duke, with as good earnestness of good meaning as by words and oaths he could, did affirm the same; and thereupon the Queen's Majesty, trusting that the King of Spain was of the same mind, she did send a solemn ambassade of her Privy Counsellors, whereof one was an ancient Earl of the realm, the other also an ancient Baron of the same, and others of the Council of her State: who, when they came to the place appointed for their meeting, and demanding to see the commission from the King, whereof the Duke of Parma had made mention, there was none extant; but by speech, it was said that they looked for one shortly out of Spain; but while such one was thus promised, and treaty held on, her Majesty had certain knowledge of the King's preparation of a navy and army, so mighty, as the like never was made in any man's memory, and with all haste possible, to come to the narrow seas to invade this realm.—Whereupon her Majesty, for defence of her realm, armed some number of ships, far inferior in number to the King of Spain's; yet Almighty God, for her defence, and to be justly revenged upon this manner of deceitful dealing of the King of Spain, to further his dangerous attempts by colour to treat of a peace, did subvert the King of Spain's army with such a ruin, as to this day he hath not been able to make the like.

* Birch.—In his Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, a full and very particular account is given, of the embassy of Sir Robert Cecil, and his conferences and negotiations with Henry.

"This dishonourable accident hath been known to the world to be true, and you our Commissioners may boldly say, If Richardot, the King's President, shall be there, he cannot truly deny it; but rather may be charged as privy to the same, as he was openly at Burborough by our Commissioners charged."

The paper then goes on to observe what reason the Queen had to doubt whether the present practices of Spain did not resemble the former ones, and how, upon inquiry, it was actually discovered, that there was no Commissioner indeed from the King of Spain to treat with England, but only with the French King; that an offer was made to send for one, but when it came, the English Commissioners were denied a copy of it. Supposing it, however, to be sufficient, the following directions for their proceedings are next entered upon:

"First, you shall require to know of them, whether there be any intention in them to debate upon the occasions that have ministered these great hostilities between these two crowns, that aforetime had such perfect amity betwixt them."

We need not go into the directions to be followed, in case such a discussion should be entered upon, but it may not be amiss to observe that, "the first notable unfriendly actions of the King of Spain," are stated to have been, "his refusing at the beginning of the Queen's reign to ratify his father's treaties, commonly named Fœdus Structum Amicitiæ," which appears to have been a collection of "mutual bonds, never repealed," between the House of Burgundy and England, sealed and confirmed on both parts, "in such strict manner as is not to be seen in any other foreign dominions." It is also alleged, that in contempt of such bonds, the King had "incited certain of the greatest Nobility in England to rebel, seeking at the same time how to invade this realm," against which the Queen had been obliged to enter into measures of defence, "to the misliking of the King of Spain, and to withstand his great hostility."

It is then proposed rather to overlook these things, and only consider the state of former treaties, "both for mutual amity between the Princes, and for the intercourse of the merchants and subjects on both sides;" and, "for a new treaty to be made with sufficient words and in good form, to confirm and ratify all former treaties that were in force at the entry of the King of Spain to his Duchy of Brabant, being termed the joyous entry;" with "a perfect remission and oblivion of all past hostilities, and a mutual release of prisoners."

These preliminaries being adjusted, "the first and principal matter," as the paper runs, "that we are to demand is, to have the United Provinces, with whom now for our safety we are bound to a mutual defence, to have such assurance made to them, and promised to us also by special covenant, as they may continue in the state wherein they are, both for the government of the people and country, for their ancient liberties, and defence of their towns and forts, without changing of their profession or religion; which being granted with good assurance, we shall have just cause to accept that peace before treated on, and to make account of the continuance thereof."—And to shew how necessary an article the above was esteemed, as a security to England itself, reference is made to all the projects entertained against England by the Spanish Governors of the Low Countries, from the Duke of Alva's first coming, to that time; during which period, "such hath been their earnestness, fraught with diabolical malice, as divers of them, among whom some have been of the general Governors, that have, to accomplish their purposes, hired certain persons to have killed us, and some to have poisoned us. Which purpose Almighty God in good time discovered to us, and the parties apprehended, and voluntarily confessed the same, and received their death for the same without repentance. But the author that moved them thereto, being a Governor of the Low Countries, even with tokens from the King of Spain, did never give any cause to excuse himself, though he could not but hear how the parties did openly avow him to have procured and hired them." We cannot cannot bring ourselves to omit the following passage, as it touches upon some very nice points in the policy of England, during the whole of Lord Burghley's administration:—"Now for that it is like that the Spanish deputies will answer, that the people of the United Provinces are the King of Spain's subjects in right of his Dukedom of Burgundy, and being Earl of Holland and Zealand, and that we have no more interest to join with them, than we will suffer the King to deal with our subjects in England; you may see, that if the King had not by his tyrannous governors oppressed them, and attempted to subdue them, to have exiled them that were natural and obedient, to have inhabited the country with Spaniards, as he hath generally done in other countries, and especially in India, by the destruction of more creatures than all Spain hath living, then in truth their answer to be allowed. But they are also to consider that this is not the question, whether we shall or may intermeddle in the causes concerning the King's subjects in general, but whether upon good proof finding that he doth earnestly suppress his subjects, and seeketh by conquering of them both to plant his Spanish nation there, and with them, by possessing and conquering of those countries, to proceed thereby to the invasion and conquest of England. These circumstances being certainly proved true by many certainties that cannot be justly denied, the question then, accompanied with those circumstances, is to be answered, that both the States of the Provinces have just cause, even by the law of nations, to arm and defend their natural country and families against the tyrannous bloody attempts for their subversion, and planting of strangers, Spaniards, not unlike to tigers, in their habitations; and so have we as just cause for our own surety and our country, to join with the said States and their countries, to preserve them so in their liberties, as the Spaniard, intending to conquer them, shall not also prosecute their intentions to conquer England.

"And for that it is like the Spanish Commissioners will, for answer to these your arguments, peremptorily deny that any good proof can be made of the King's intention to subdue or to oppress the Low Countries, or to invade England, you shall have a collection made of the sundry actions committed by his Governors, and of sundry other his Ministers; which are so many in number, and so various in their qualities, as were a tedious work to be inserted in these instructions; to which collection we do remit you," &c.

The paper concludes with some specific proposals for the surety of the States to the following effects: "That they be permitted to continue in arms for their defence, without attempting any hostility upon any of the King's territories now in his possession.

"That the people may be governed as heretofore by the natural officers of every province.

"That all strange soldiers may be withdrawn from the Low Countries, and the necessary garrisons to consist of the native people.*

"And for more certainty, and to avoid length in the treaty, that the assurance may be agreeable to the pacificat of Gaunt, which was confirmed by the King, and sworn to by Don John."

It is certainly very extraordinary that an opportunity should have been afforded to Lord Burghley, of drawing up so public and important a document, amounting almost to a recapitulation of the causes of hostility between the two crowns from the Queen's accession, at such a moment; that is, in the very last year of his life, and still more extraordinary, that it should have happened to be the last year also of the life of Philip II., who died in the very next month to Lord Burghley.†

The instructions happened to be drawn up besides for his own son; the chief commissioner sent to Henry IV., on an embassy the most delicate, perhaps, that could be conceived; for he had to charge that high-spirited and martial prince, with a breach of his word, a violation of solemn covenants, and a base abandonment of Allies, who had rendered him assistance, at the most trying and awful period of his whole life!!‡ and in none of these respects did Sir Robert spare

* Compare what was done upon the first interference of Elizabeth with the affairs of Scotland. The cases were in reality parallel, and singularly illustrative of each other; as Scotland was in the way to be a "stepping-stone" to France, the Low Countries were constantly in the way to become a "stepping-stone" to Spain for the invasion and ruin of England.

† Philip was just seven years younger than Lord Burghley, having been born in 1527; he was called into Flanders by his father in 1548, who wished to make him King of the Romans, instead of his uncle Ferdinand, but in vain. He, however, resigned Flanders to Philip in 1555, and Spain the year after.

‡ Among Sir John Harrington's papers, 1598, we find the following passage: "News from the Ambassadors to France, Wilkes died at Paris, God speed Cecil and Herbert, or we shall ill speed at home. It is a base matter of Henry of France to make peace without his allies and friends; I could wish her Highness could once sound him in the ear about this matter; she seemeth in apt sort for such business, for she called him, in my hearing, the Antichrist of ingratitude."

even Henry the Great; insomuch that that otherwise amiable and popular Monarch is reported to have been stung with his reproaches. Henry had had to undergo a trial little less severe from the remonstrances of the Dutch minister, Barnevelt;* for in truth, the envoys of both countries were not long before they discovered, as we before had occasion to remark, that Henry, "minding his own concernment," as Camden writes, "had made a private agreement with the Spaniard about a peace, which was secretly deposited in the Archduke Albert's hands, until a commission might be sent out of Spain perfectly to conclude it. This was certainly very ignominious on the part of Henry, who had nothing to plead but a pretended necessity, and the call made upon him to seize an opportunity that should not be lost; upon which latter plea, Sir Robert Cecil is reported to have made the following observation: "As touching the opportunity not to be lost, he would not (he said) dispute with those who preferred opportunity before their word and faith given, and measured the honour and reputation of princes by profit and fair occasions, and think it to consist solely in providing for their own affairs."

More to the above effect may be seen in Camden and other authors, and nothing perhaps more cutting than the short but severe letter of the Queen herself to her ungrateful ally; we do not, however, wish to bear hard upon the fame of a Monarch on various other accounts so much to be admired, and who, after all, professed to have a high veneration and respect for Elizabeth.† To return therefore to the paper, of which we have given so long an abstract, we repeat, that it was extraordinary that Lord Burghley should have had such an occasion given him of recapitulating, just before he died, all that had passed

* See for an account of this able Dutch minister, Birch's Memoirs, i. p. 364.

† Henry's ministers and principal counsellors were held to be, but a short time before, the regular pensioners of Spain, as M. Castol, wrote to Mr. Bacon, March 16, 1595-6, observing that doublons were more common in France, than escus de soleil, Birch, i. 452. Wishing, however, before we part from Henry IV. to do him all the justice in our power, we shall transcribe from Professor Tytler's Elements of General History, the following very concise remarks upon his conduct after the treaty concluded between him and Philip on the present occasion: "After forcing Philip II. to conclude the advantageous peace of Vervins, 1598, his whole attention was bestowed on the improvement of his kingdom, by reforming its laws, regulating its finances, encouraging agriculture and manufactures, enlarging and embellishing the cities, and finally, by successfully reconciling the partisans of the contending religions. In all his beneficial schemes he found an able assistant in his minister the Duke of Sully, who has beautifully depicted the life and character of his master. It is in his Memoirs that we see not only the great designs, but the private virtues, the engaging and amiable manners of this illustrious man, who, while he was the arbiter of the contending powers of Europe, was the indulgent father of a happy people."

between Spain and England during his long administration; including the ancient history of the United Provinces as an independent Republic; the reprobated tyranny of Philip there, and in the Western Indies; his continual breach of faith, and the horrid purposes to which he was stimulated by his bigotry, in the projected assassination of Elizabeth, after the actual murder of the Prince of Orange.

The Paper, however, is still of the more importance, because it exhibits Lord Burghley at the close of his wearisome life, anxious to secure to his Sovereign, his country, and to Europe at large, the blessings of peace; but in no abject manner, under no disgraceful compromise of principle or honour, no acknowledgment either of faults or fears, no anxiety to shun inquiry, but rather to challenge it, in defence of all that had passed on the side of England.* And this is the more worth attending to, because his young and martial competitor, Essex, was jealous of all his movements, and exceedingly anxious to have more scope allowed him for chivalrous, if not rash adventures, by a continuance of the war: he ventured to remonstrate with the venerable Lord Treasurer, who is reported, as is pretty generally known, to have directed his attention to the following passage in the Psalms, "The blood-thirsty shall not live out half their days." "Yet some there were," says Camden, "who highly applauded Essex, as one that sincerely aimed at the honour and security of his country," and who need doubt this? It would have been so at all times: Camden, however, is careful to add, "Others there were who taxed him as one that served his own ambition, and the benefit and advantage of his followers." The probability is that both parties meant right:† Essex might

* Macdiarmid, in his Lives of British Statesmen, thus speaks of Lord Burghley's love of peace: "Yet, though the strenuous advocate of a pacific policy, his forbearance did not arise from timidity, nor his parsimony from a contracted mind; against the dangers which threatened the kingdom, he prepared with firmness and activity; and when the public interests seemed to require it, he could advise a large expenditure and extensive armaments. While the prospect of the Spanish invasion filled the nation with just alarm, he deliberately drew up the plans of defence; and by his serene and collected demeanour seconded his courageous Mistress in diffusing general confidence and intrepidity."

† "Cecil," says Macdiarmid, "was no less interested for the glory of his country than Essex; yet while he felt how much security depends on political reputation, he also perceived the folly of attempting to render a nation glorious by wasting her resources, or great by reducing her to imbecility. Averse to the idle waste of the people's property, and detesting the wanton effusion of human blood, he remonstrated against sacrificing the best interests of the nation to the avarice or ambition of a few individuals; nor could he without indignation see both prince and people led away by the same passions as Essex, and giving up the reins of their understanding to the most sincerely aim at the honour and security of his country, while he served his own ambition, and was anxious to benefit his followers; but no difference of opinion at this time could disturb the tranquil glories of BURGHLEY's last labours. At all events, he must now be acknowledged to have been right, had his wish been accomplished; and though not accomplished, by an absolute cessation of war, at that time, he was able, according to Camden, "while he lay desperately sick, and almost past hope of recovery," to enter into a negotiation with the States, whereby the Queen was eased of expenses in the further prosecution of the war, to the amount of 120,000*l.* English, yearly; "all," says Camden, "by the wisdom and discretion of the Lord Burghley, and the negotiation of Sir Thomas Bodley, and George Gilpin, who succeeded the latter in the Council of the States." A passage we have the more need to quote, because Rapin, who generally follows Camden, but who, being a Hugonot, felt perhaps more for the Dutch Calvinists than Elizabeth, gives quite a different turn to this negotiation with the States, representing it to be a pure piece of artifice, to make them answerable for the war, which she herself after all wished to continue, a circumstance rendered doubtful by the difference between Burghley and Essex already referred to, and the account given by Camden of the two parties into which the Court was divided, and of whose opposite reasonings and arguments concerning war and peace, he has given a very good account. Another and much more modern writer, Macdiarmid, in speaking of the frugality of Cecil's administration, observes, "The large debts contracted by Elizabeth's father and sister, with which she found the crown encumbered on her accession, amounted it is said to four millions, an enormous sum in that age; yet these she quickly discharged, and at her death, could rank her most potent allies among her debtors. The States of Holland owed her eight hundred thousand pounds, and the King of France, four hundred and fifty thousand." This author, however, seems rather to contradict himself, in what he says just afterwards of Elizabeth's having had no recourse to illegal extortions; since he had certainly represented some of her forced loans, though well managed and applied, to have been of that description. "The frugality delusions of a heated brain:" p. 194. He admits that there was much to dazzle the eyes of the public, and of the Queen, in the advantages and riches to be acquired by maritime expeditions; but he gives Lord Burghley, at the same time, credit for regarding these expeditions as little better than piracy, and a misdirection of the industrious talents and habits of the people, as well as of the capital of the nation.

of Elizabeth," he goes on to observe, " did not escape censure; and Cecil, by whose counsel it was known to be enforced, was often reproached with sacrificing the best allies of England, to his little-minded and parsimonious policy; but events fully justified his sagacity, while our allies were raised to the most vigorous exertion, and finally triumphed over all their enemies; England herself, the main spring of these efforts, advanced in a progressive course of prosperity." That Cecil knew how and when to be liberal as well as frugal, may be seen from other remarks of the same writer, and particularly in his section on the improvement of the soldiers' condition.

But to return—

There was no adequate and proper motive for continuing the war, if the United Provinces might be left to the enjoyment of their newly acquired rights and independence, and England relieved from the expenses and commercial restraints incident to war. For the arguments of those who were averse from peace, and the able replies to those arguments by the opposite party, we must refer to Camden, who has, as connected with these differences about a peace, related in this place that remarkable story of Essex, receiving, and venturing to shew his resentment of, a blow from the Queen's hand: but it does not belong to this memoir to do more than allude to it; the next passage in Camden's History, however, must be transcribed at length.

" In the midst of these discontents," says that historian, who had the best means of knowing the truth of his own relation, " died WILLIAM CECIL Lord BURGHLEY, Lord High Treasurer of England, being before spent with continued labour and employment of mind, the gout and old age, so that he gave himself over to sorrow and pensiveness, and writing a letter to the Queen, earnestly besought her that he might lay down his offices of Magistracy. Upon this SHE visited him now and then, comforting him with kind and loving words; but within a few days, having now lived long enough to nature, long enough to his own glory, but not long enough to his country, he rendered his soul to GOD so quietly and peaceably, that the greatest adversary he had, said he envied him for nothing so much, as for such a death in so great glory; whereas, for the most part, the great ministers of public affairs have more sad and unhappy ends. Certainly he was a most excellent man, who (to say nothing of his reverend presence, his calm and undisturbed countenance) was so framed by nature, so polished and adorned with learning and education, that every way for honesty, gravity, temperance, industry, and justice, he was a most accomplished person. Hereunto add his fluent and eloquent speech* (and that not affected, but plain, natural, and easy); his wisdom, confirmed by experience, and seasoned with great moderation; his approved fidelity, and above all, his singular piety towards God. To speak all in a word, the Queen was happy in so great a Counsellor, and the state of England for ever indebted to him for his sage and prudent counsel."

The above, it must be remembered, is the testimony of one who knew him personally and well; nor should it be forgotten, considering the harsh and rude terms in which this great Minister is continually spoken of, in the books devoted to the cause of Mary, Queen of Scots, (of modern date,) that the praises bestowed upon him in the above extract, are from the pen of a historian, writing under the eye, and, as it has been very credibly reported, subject to the corrections, of JAMES, the son of Mary;† and in a work noted, by some, for its partiality‡ towards that unhappy Queen.

* We have a particular testimony on record, that his public speeches were, to all appearance, the fruits of as little premeditation and preparation as possible. "It was observed," says his domestic biographer, "that for all his long and public speeches, he was never seen to study a quarter of an hour, or to take notes, or turn to books for any of his speeches—his long experience and practice made him need no helps." And again: "His general knowledge of all things of action and experience, in all learning or reading, was such, as he carried that in his head as others sought in books, precedents, and records. His best record was his experience, memory, and notable invention, even to all perfection that could be in a man."

† It is certainly rather remarkable, that when JAMES issued his order or warrant for the printing and publishing of Camden's history, from the beginning of the Queen's reign to the year 1589, he should allow it to be dated, "in the 12th year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland, and of Scotland the 48th," thereby expressly confirming his mother's deposition in 1567, the warrant being issued in 1615. This might be unavoidable, but it has an odd appearance, considering all that has been since written upon the subject.

‡ The celebrated Sir Robert Cotton, to whom we are indebted for the preservation of the MSS. composing the Cottonian Library, is said to have been employed by James, to write animadversions upon Buchanan's and Thuanus' accounts of the behaviour and actions of Mary, Queen of Scots, and to give a different turn to them, from what had been given by those two famous historians. What he drew up is supposed to be interwoven with Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, or else printed at the end of Camden's Epistles.—Biog. Brit. We must confess that having arrived, after very great labour and fatigue, at the end of the Life of Lord Burghley, we regard with astonishment the inconsiderate zeal, to say no worse, of those authors, who, in their regard for the reputation of Mary, Queen of Scots, have loaded him with reproaches the most unqualified, the most gross, and, in our opinion, the most unjustifiable; as we hope, in most instances, to have proved, by setting things, as far as we could, not in the light in which they

We shall pass on to some other accounts of his Lordship, written by contemporaries; particularly the domestic historian of his life and character, already so often cited, chiefly following, however, an abstract prepared to our hands, free from the ancient spelling, and more suited to the present taste, having, besides, the support of other memorials. Where the author had better be left to speak for himself, we shall introduce his own words.

"As to his end, it was conformable to his life, easy, natural, in the midst of his family, full of years, and of glory. In a word, he died possessed of the favour of his Prince, the love of the people, the respect even of his enemies; he had also, what he often sought to resign, the greatest and most honourable offices in the kingdom, besides a large estate, and dutiful and excellent children. Thus blessed with all that a man could desire, on the 4th of August, 1598,* about four in the morning, in the presence of twenty persons, children, friends, and servants, he yielded up the ghost with wonderful serenity, being upwards of seventy-seven years of age."

Strype has printed what is entitled, Oratio Expirantis Domini, being the prayer made and read by Mr. Thompson, his Lordship's Chaplain, the night before he died.—See his Annals, vol. iv. p. 468. No. ccxlix. Of his last moments, his faithful domestic gives the following account: "His death was not sudden, [see before, p. 457.] nor his pain in sickness great, for he continued languishing two or three months, yet went abroad to take air in his coach all that time, retiring himself from the Court, sometimes to his house at Theobalds, and sometimes at London; his greatest infirmity appearing to be the weakness of his stomach; it was also thought his mind was troubled that he could not work a peace for his country, which he earnestly laboured and desired of any thing, seeking to leave have been placed by the chivalrous defenders of Mary, but in that light in which, in all human probability, they must have appeared to Lord Burghley, as the Defender of Elizabeth, of England, and of Protestantism.

* It is somewhat strange that we have in Hentzner's travels, an account of Theobalds (or rather of the gardens), written while Lord Burghley lay dead. It may be seen in the third volume of Nichols' Progresses, 341. "We were not admitted to see the apartments of this palace," he writes, "there being nobody to shew it, as the family was in town attending the funeral of their Lord." It is, we apprehend, pretty generally known, that two funerals took place; one at Westminster, and the other at Stamford; nor was it exactly known where the body was at the time: if in the coffin at Westminster, it was soon after conveyed to Stamford, but as the registers attest that the funeral at both places took place on the 29th of August, 1598, one of them must have been but a scene of delusive ceremony.—See Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. p. 42.

it as he had long kept it. For there was no other worldly thing to give him cause of grief; he had the favour of his Prince, the love of his people, great offices, honors, livings, good children, and all blessings the world could afford him; yet he contemned the world, and desired nothing but death, either because he had lived long enough, and desired to be in heaven, or else because he could not live to do that good for his country he would, or rather, as is most likely, both; for he had seen and tasted so much both of the sweet and sour of the world, as made him weary to live, and knew so much of the joys of his salvation, wherein was his onely comfort, as gave him cause to desire death, when it was God's good pleasure, as he often said, but how or whatsoever it was, the signe was infallibly good. He contemned this life, and expected the next; for there was no earthly thing wherein he took comfort, but in contemplation, reading, or hearing the Scriptures, Psalmes, and Praieres. About ten or twelve daies before he died he grew weak, and so dryvenne to kepe his bed, complayning onely of a pain in his breast, which was thought to be the humor of the goute (wherewith he was so long possessed) falling to that place, without any ague, fever, or sign of distemper or danger, and that paine not great nor continuall, but by fits, and so continued, till within one night before his death. At six of the clock at night, the Phisitions finding no distemper in his pulse or bodie, but assuring his life, affirming it was impossible he should be hartsicke, that had so good temper, and so perfect pulse and senses; yet at seven of the clock following, he fell into a convultion like to the shaking of an ague. Now, quoth he, the Lord be praised, the tyme is come; and calling his children, blessed them and took his leave, commanding them to love and feare God, and love one another; he also praid for the Queen, that she might live longe and die in peace. Then he called for Thomas Bellot, his Steward, one of his Executors, and delivered him his will, saieing, I have ever found thee true to me, and I nowe trust thee with all. Who like a godlie honest man, praid his Lordship as he had lived religiously so now to remember his Savioure Christ, by whose blood he was to have forgiveness of his sins; with manie the like speeches used by his Chaplaines, to whom he answered, it was done already, for he was assured God had forgiven his sins, and would save his soul."

To proceed with the abstracts, it would be easy to collect a multitude of passages, not only from English but foreign historians, in praise of this able and honest Statesman; but it might look like ostentation, of which, assuredly, his character stands in no need; even this imperfect picture, which has been drawn in these papers, as it is collected from impartial writers, and from memoirs of undoubted authority, must satisfy the reader that he deserved, in a very remarkable manner, the confidence of his Sovereign, the love of the English nation, the gratitude of posterity, and that tribute of fame, which hath been so amply and so willingly paid him by all such writers, at home and abroad, as have had occasion to mention him, or his administration. His private character, his conduct in the ordinary affairs of life, his tenderness towards his family, with some account of the fortune which he raised from the emoluments arising to him out of the high offices he discharged, must be considered as a proper appendix to the memoirs of his public life.

"Though not remarkably tall, nor eminently handsome, his person, we are told, was always agreeable, and became more and more so as he grew in years, age becoming him better than youth; the hair of his head and beard grew perfectly white; and he preserved, almost to his dying day, a fine and florid complexion; his temper contributed much towards making him generally beloved, for he was always serene and cheerful; so perfect a master of his looks and words, that what passed in his mind, was never discoverable from either;* patient in hearing, ready in answering, yet without any quickness, and in a style suited to the understanding of him to whom he spoke.

"Idleness was his aversion; and though from twenty-five years of age, at which he was sworn a Privy-counsellor, being then the youngest, as at his death the oldest, in Europe, he laboured under a great weight of public business; yet, when he had any vacant moments, he spent them not in trifles, or in pursuit of sensual pleasures, but reading, meditating, or writing; he had a perfect knowledge not only of foreign countries, but of foreign Courts; knew the genius of every Prince in Europe, his Counsellors and favourites; he was particularly conversant with the treaties between the several states of Europe, and could direct all Ambassadors; he was acquainted with the course of every Court of Judicature in England; knew its rise, jurisdiction, and proper sphere of action; within which he took care that it should act with vigour, and was no less careful that it should not exceed its bounds;† he wrote not only elegant

* See Macdiarmid on his prudent reserve.

† How far Lord Burghley was able, by any authority he possessed, to regulate the proceedings of any of the Courts of Justice at that period, we cannot pretend to say; certain it is, that the Judges, under the Tudor race, were too yielding at times to the arbitrary spirit of those Princes, and are little to be compared with their truly independent successors, since the era of the Revo-

Latin prose, but also very good verse, in that and the English language;* he understood Greek as well as most men in that age; and was so learned in divinity, that divines of all persuasions were desirous of submitting to his judgment; his peculiar diversions were the study of the state of England, and pedigrees of its Nobility and Gentry; of these last he drew whole books with his own hands, so that he was better versed in descents and families than most of the heralds; and would often surprise persons of distinction at his table, by appearing better acquainted with their manors, parks, woods, &c., than they were themselves. To this continual application, and to his genius, naturally comprehensive, was owing that fund of knowledge which made him never at a loss, in any company, or upon any subject."

As he was long in great offices, and was a person of much economy, yet he thought it both decent and honourable, as certainly it was, to keep up the dignity of his station in his manner of living. He had, during Queen Elizabeth's reign, four places of residence; his lodgings at Court, his house in the Strand,† his lution, and the famous act of George III. One Judge, however, who seems to have braved the prerogative, and interfered to prevent unlawful arrests, with good effect, appears to have had the countenance of Lord Burghley, as well in regard to his appointment to the Bench, as in respect of his remonstrances on the subjects alluded to. We mean the famous Chief Justice Anderson, an indiscreet man in manners, but a sound Lawyer, and "one that would not," says his biographer, "be driven from what he thought right, by any authority whatever."

* It can scarcely be expected that we should have a long list to produce of his literary compositions, in prose or poetry, considering the account we have had to give of his incessant occupations as a Statesman. The following, perhaps, as taken from Lord Orford's Royal and Noble Authors, and thence transcribed by the editors of the Biographia Britannica, and Mr. Chalmers in his Dictionary, may be sufficient: "Carmina duo Latina in obitum Margareta Nevillæ, Reginæ Catherinæ à Cubiculis;" "Carmen Latinum in Memoriam Tho. Challoneri equitis aurati, præfixum ejusdem libro de restaurata republica;" "La complainte de l'ame pecheresse," in French verse, extant in the King's Library; a Preface to Queen Catherine's Parr's Lamentation of a Sinner; "Lord Burghley's Precepts or Directions for the well-ordering of a man's life." These, with the public papers and memorials already noticed, the tract on the Execution of Justice in England, and his answers to various letters, are all that can be put to his account as an author; Holinshed, indeed, puts him into his list of English historians, but it is supposed to be only on account of the materials he furnished for the Diarium Expeditionis Scoticæ, published by William Patten, 1541, and noticed in our first volume.

† Of his house in the Strand, an account may be seen, after several authors, in Nichols's Progresses, vol. iii. 79; and a sketch of it in the Gentleman's Magazine, vol. lvi. p. 1007. See also Newcourt's Repertorium, and Peck's Desiderata Curiosa. Of his seat at Burghley, the residence of his lineal descendant, the present Marquess of Exeter, K. G., many accounts are extant. A family-seat at Burghley, and his own favourite seat at Theobalds. At his house in London, he had fourscore persons in family, exclusive of those who attended him at Court. His expenses there, as we have it from a person who lived many years in his family, were thirty pounds a-week in his absence, and between forty and fifty when present. At Theobalds, he had about thirty persons in family, and besides a constant allowance in charity, he directed ten pounds a-week to be laid out in keeping the poor at work in his gardens, &c. &c.* The expense of his tables were a thousand marks a-year; so that, as he had a great income, and left a good estate to his children, he was not afraid of keeping up also a port suited to his offices, though it provoked the envy of his enemies, and did, as it will always do, engage many mouths to murmur at him because they were not fed by him. He carried things still farther: he kept a standing table for gentlemen, and two other tables for persons of meaner condition, which were always served alike, whether he were in town or out of town.

About his person he had people of distinction, insomuch that our author tells us, that while in his service, he could reckon up twenty gentlemen, retainers, view of the House is to be seen among the engravings in Nichols's Progresses, vol. i. and in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. A more ancient representation, with a description of the place, and "of all the principal paintings and other rarities now to be seen there," in a letter to Roger Gale, jun. Esq. from Mr. Peck. It is without date, but rather ancient and very curious; it was probably written in the time of Brownlow, ninth Earl of Exeter, who came to the title in 1754. Burghley House appears to have been begun in 1575.

Of Theobalds, we have had occasion to say much already. Sir Robert Cecil improved it after his father's death, and rendered it so desirable for a kingly palace, that King James procured him to exchange it for Hatfield; and it was at Theobalds that that King died in 1627.

* "I have heard his officers affirm, that at his Lordship's being at Theobalds, it has cost him fourscore pounds a-week."—MS. "He would buy great quantities of corn in time of dearth, to furnish markets about his house at under prices, to pull down the price to relieve the poor."—ib. Compare Macdiarmid, 244. And in his absence from Theobalds, he relieved there daily at his gate, twenty or thirty poor people; and, by the hands of his Chaplain, gave weekly twenty shillings to the poor.

For his number of attendants, he was as honourably and orderly served as sorted with a man of his Lordship's place and degree; and, as near as he could, he would never entertain any contentious, vicious, or evil-disposed persons. His steward kept a standing table for gentlemen, besides two other long tables, many times twice set—one for the clerk of the kitchen, the other for yeomen.

"His harvest lasted every year for above thirty days together, wherein he allowed some of his servants the same courtesy Boaz granted Ruth (viz. to glean even among the sheaves, and suffered some handfuls also to fall on purpose for them), whereby they raised great estates."—Fuller's Holy State—alluding as much to his hospitality as his charity.

who had each a thousand pounds a-year, and as many among his ordinary servants, who were worth from one thousand to three, five, ten, and twenty thousand.

Twelve times he entertained the Queen at his house for several weeks together, at the expense of two or three thousand pounds each time.

Yet with all this mighty expense, it was the opinion of competent judges, that an avaricious man would have made more of his offices in seven years than he did in forty.

With respect to his children, he was accounted the best of fathers; for he had them and their descendants continually at his table; and this he made the greatest pleasure of his life; his mother also being alive, and able to see the fifth descent from herself, there being no degree of relation or consanguinity which, at festival times, was not to be found at Lord Burghley's table. It was there that, laying aside all thoughts of business, he was so affable, easy, and merry, that he seemed never to have thought of any; and yet this was the only part of his life which was entirely free therefrom: and his frankness and familiarity brought such and so many persons of high rank to his house, as did him great credit and service.

In respect to his friends, he was always easy, cheerful, and kind; and whatever their condition was, he talked to them as if they had been his equals in every respect; yet it is said, that he was held a better enemy than friend, and that this was so well known, that some opposed him from a view of interest. It is certain, that those who were most intimate with him, had no sort of influence over him, and did not care to ask for any thing, because he did not readily grant, and was little pleased with such sort of suits. One reason of this was, that most of them whom he preferred, became his enemies, because he would not gratify them in farther pretensions. His secrets he trusted to none; indulged a general conversation, and would not suffer affairs of State to be canvassed in mixed company, or when friends were met to divert themselves.

With respect to his enemies, he never said any thing harsh of them; furthered on every occasion their reasonable requests, and was so far from seeking, that he plainly neglected every opportunity of revenge, always professing, that he never went to bed out of charity with any man; and frequently saying, that patience, and calm bearing of aspersion and injuries, had wrought him more good than his own abilities.

He was far, however, from being an ungrateful man; for without intreating he would serve his friends, as far as it was just; and his servants, and those about him, he was very careful of their welfare, mostly at his own expense. He never raised his own rents, or displaced his tenants; and as the rent was when he bought land, so it stood; insomuch that some enjoyed for 20*l.* a year, during his whole life, what might have been let for 200*l.* Yet in his public character he was very severe, and as he never meddled with the Queen's treasure himself, so he would see that it was not embezzled by others; for it was his saying, that whoever cheated the Crown, oppressed the people. In the midst of all his grandeur, he was very easy of access, free from pride, and alike complaisant to all degrees of people; for he was very grave in council, exact in courts of justice, familiar towards his friends, outwardly and inwardly fond of his children; so when he went into the country, he would converse with all his servants, as kindly, as if they had been his equal; talk to country people in their own style and manner, and would even condescend to soothe little children in their sports and play; so gentle his temper, and so abundant his good nature.

At Theobalds he had five gardens, which cost him a great deal of money, and which were laid out according to his own directions.

He had a little mule, upon which he rode up and down the walks;* sometimes he would look on those who were shooting with arrows, or playing with bowls; but as for himself, he never took any diversion, taking that word in its usual sense. He had two or three friends, who were constantly at his table, because he liked their company; but in all his life, he never had any favourite, or suffered any body to get an ascendant over him. His equipage, his great house-keeping, his numerous dependence, were the effects of his sense, and not at all of his passions; for he delighted little in any of them; and whenever he had any time to spare, he fled, as his expression was, to Theobalds, and buried himself in privacy.

We ought to conclude this draught of his private character, with speaking of his religion, but we have had such occasion to dwell upon it heretofore, as he was the great pillar of the Church, and the great Patron of the Clergy, that there is no need of expatiating on it here. Let us only attend to two instances of his sincerity in this point: the first, his readiness to be reconciled to his enemies; which was so great, that he never refused it, let the condition of those who sought it be what it would; and even while they remained at enmity with him, he would upon all occasions express an esteem for their abilities, and willingness to promote their advancement.* The second, his resignation in his last illness, in which, while he testified a most cheerful sense of the signal blessings he enjoyed in his life, he shewed not only a satisfaction, but an earnest desire of dying.

He comforted and instructed his children with much tenderness, but without betraying any weakness. He prayed fervently, and as his custom was, in Latin, whence some raised a report that he was a Papist: yet he never shewed any discomposure at the approach of death; but as he lived with the charity, so he died with the constancy of a Christian.

He gave largely to the poor in his lifetime, erected an almshouse at Stamford, and by his will bequeathed munificently, but not lavishly, to charitable uses. A few particulars, from his life by a Domestic, ought here to be added, as they are very striking:—

"He gave for releasing of prisoners, in many of his latter years, forty and fifty pounds in a term; and for twenty years together, he gave yearly in beef, bread, and money, at Christmas, to the poor of Westminster, St. Martin's, St. Clement's, and Theobalds, thirty-five, and sometimes forty pounds per annum. [N.B. The great difference of the value of money should always be considered.] He gave also to twenty poor men lodging in the Savoy, twenty suits of apparel; he gave also to poor prisoners and poor parishes in money, weekly, forty-and-five shillings." In the Vth Book of Peck's Desiderata, vol. i. No. xvii. may be seen at length "The ordinances made by Sir William Cecil, Knight of the Order of the Garter, Baron of Burghley, for the order and government of xiij poor men, whereof one to be Warden, of the Hospital of Stamford Baron, in the county of Northampton."—The date, August 20, 1597. 39 Eliz. It is accompanied with a plate, or what the author calls "The Ichnography of Lord Burghley's Hospital, as it stood ann. 1597—from an old MS." The rules or ordinances are xxvi. in number.*

* "Cautiously avoiding all interference with the rivalships and quarrels of the other courtiers, and giving no reasonable ground for offence, he bore the injuries of his enemies without any appearance of resentment, and endeavoured to bring them into the number of his friends by taking the first opportunity to promote their interests. When the Earl of Leicester, who had always thwarted his measures, and often calumniated his character, at length fell under the Queen's displeasure, Burghley successfully exerted himself to procure the restoration of this virulent opponent to favour. Nor did he hesitate to form a hearty reconciliation with Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, who had long been one of his most dangerous enemies, and who had desisted from his practices only when he found Burghley's power too firmly established to be shaken. Although Essex was his avowed and turbulent opponent, yet when Elizabeth refused some just claim of that nobleman, the Lord Treasurer supported his cause with so much firmness, that the enraged Queen bestowed upon him some of those epithets, by which she usually made her Courtiers feel her displeasure."—Macdiarmid.

Lord Buckhurst succeeded Lord Burghley in the office of Treasurer, and in Sir John Harrington's "Notes and Observations," we find the following entry, two months only after Lord Burghley's death :—

October 1598.—"I this day went to the new Lord High Treasurer, Lord Buckhurst. I was not ill received; nor, in sooth, so well as I had been used to in the day of Lord Burghley. When shall our realm see such a man, or when such a mistress have such a servant? Well might one weep when the other died. This choice doth well assure us, that in the wit of the servant dwelleth the master's fortune, and that all states have thriven better or worse, as the government was given to such as were honest and able. If a King hath not discernment to chuse a few wise heads, how shall he subdue the many foolish hearts? or how shall the leaves and blossoms flourish, when the sap is corrupted at the root? I could herewith cite many good authorities, both Greek and Latin, to prove this mine opinion; but I do remember what Burghley did once say in my hearing to Walsingham, who had been waiting to confer with him about many great matters, whereof I had borne some part, in bearing a message from the Queen to Hatton. When my Lord Treasurer did come in from prayers, Sir Francis Walsingham did in merry sort say, that he wished himself so good a servant of God as Lord Burleigh, but that he had not been at church for a week past. Now my Lord Burleigh did gravely reply thus: 'I hold it meet for us to ask God's grace to keep us sound at heart, who have so much in our power, and to direct us to the well-doing of all the people, whom it is easy for us to injure and ruin; and herein, my good friends, the special blessing seemeth meet to be discreetly asked and wisely worne.' I did marvel at this good discourse, to see how a good man considereth his weighty charge, and striveth to keep out Satan from corrupting the heart in discharge of his duties. How few have such hearts or such heads, and therefore shall I note this for those who read hereafter."*

As Sir John alludes in the passage above to the known fact of the Queen's having wept when first told of the death of Lord Burghley, we cannot resist adding the following passage from a letter of Sir Robert Sidney (younger brother of Sir Philip) to Sir John himself, two years after Lord Burghley's death. "I do see the Queen often," he writes; "she doth wax weak since the last troubles, and Burghley's death doth often draw tears from her goodly cheeks; she walketh out but little, meditates much alone, and sometimes writes in private to her best friends."—This was in 1600.

As we have observed, that the year 1598 terminated the life of Philip II. as well as that of Lord Burghley, Sir John's observations upon the former (though not so charitable as one could wish, had Philip been less of a tyrant)† may be subjoined. After his remarks on the pious reflections of Lord Burghley, in his reply to Walsingham, he adds, "It is worthy noting, when we find how little sure happiness is allotted even to the mighty on earth, Philip of Spain reigned

* "It must be observed," says the author of the Memoirs of William Cecil, &c. "that as the Earl of Leicester's religion was much suspected, though he was a great professor, on account of his total neglect of private devotion, so the reputation of Lord Burghley's piety was supported and confirmed by his uniform and exemplary conduct. While he was Secretary of State he went every morning to the Queen's Chapel; when his infirmities obliged him to keep his chamber, he prayed by his bed-side; when he was too weak to kneel, he took his book into bed; and when he grew still more faint, he had a person to read by him. His Chaplain said prayers twice a day publicly in his family; and if any were absent, his Lordship took notice of it, and chid them very severely, though in all other respects he was the most gentle master in the world."—p. 69. See also Peck's Desiderata Curiosa.

We may add to the above, the following short passage, from a paper addressed to his young and amiable ward, the Earl of Rutland, January 1570, when he was about to set off on his travels. It stands at the head of a paper in Lord Burghley's own hand-writing, of "things to be considered in his Travels," still in existence at the State Paper Office,—"The first, the midst, and the last, is, to continue yourself in the fear of God, by daily service of him in prayer."

† "He was called," says Voltaire, "the devil of the south, because, from the centre of Spain, which is the southern part of Europe, he gave disturbance to the dominions of every other Prince. There is a very curious pasquinade in the third volume of Lodge's Illustrations of British History, to be seen, purporting to be a "Confession de la Foy Espaignolle—enseignant que toute Foy, toute Esperance, doibt ce fondée sur le trèspuissant Roy Philippe, et sur tous les Apostres de la Ste. Ligue; et qu'il ne faut faire comme les Bourbonnois, Anglois, et Protestants, que croient en Dieu seul, obeissants plutost a Cryst q'au Pape." forty-two years in troubles and disquietudes, lost his provinces, whilst he was striving to enlarge his possessions; and then, in old age, was eaten by lice when living.* God grant me no further ambition than to be eaten by worms when I am dead! and this I said to the Queen."

Many things still remain to be noticed before we bring the Memoirs of the great Lord Burghley to an end.

Having spoken of his Lordship's piety, the following preamble to his will ought not to be forgotten. The will bears date October 20, 1579, and revised many times after, viz. 25th July, 1583; 26th July, 1586; 28th October, 1588; February 20, 1589; November 1, 1591; November 20, 1593; August, 1595; and, finally, primo Martii millesimo quingentessimo nonagesimo septimo.—1597.

[From the Sloane MSS. noticed by Mr. Ellis, in the third volume of his Second Series of Original Letters, p. 189, we learn that his Lordship always carried his will, and other papers of importance relative to his estates, about with him, wherever he went.]

"Considering, by the goodness of Almighty God, I have been created a reasonable creature, and thereby ordained to serve him; and born of Christian parents, and christened in the name of the Father, of the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and, consequently, brought up and instructed, in my young years, in the knowledge of the Gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ; which was more clearly revealed in the times of my young years than it had been many years before; being thereby taught that there was no other means for the salvation of the soul but by the death and resurrection of Christ the Son of God, wherein I do put my whole confidence and trust, and do desire the assistance of his Holy Spirit to have grace to be thankful for the same, and to have a desire to obey his will and commandments, as far forth as the infirmity of my flesh will suffer, in living religiously and virtuously; whereunto, adding the inevitable certainty of the death of my body, though I am uncertain of the time; and yet by the increase of time, and infirmities of my body, necessarily induced to look shortly, by order of nature, for my worldly end; and that whatsoever worldly goods God

* He is represented by some to have died of the morbus pediculosus. Watson's Philip II. should be consulted for a fair and just account of this strange man—a Solomon to some, to others a Tiberius. The article appropriated to him in the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, is discreet and good. Mr. Turner has introduced some curious extracts concerning him from the Memoirs of De Cheverney. "In his private capacity," says Voltaire, "we shall find him a rigid and suspicious master, a cruel lover, a barbarous husband, and an unnatural father."

hath given, or rather lent unto me, I do certainly know that, by death, I must leave them all to the world; and that whatsoever godly and spiritual graces and gifts hath been, by God's special grace, bestowed on me, I hope, certainly, by God's goodness and mercy, though my body shall be committed to earth, yet to enjoy the fruits thereof in heaven, after this mortal life, if I shall use and dispose them in this life to God's glory, acknowledging them to have proceeded of his mere goodness, and that more plenteously than to many others.

"Upon all these, and many like considerations, I being at this present time occupied with the cogitations of my mortality, and yet of whole mind and memory (for which I humbly thank Almighty God), do determine, as many times heretofore I have done, to declare my last will and testament, in writing, concerning the disposition of my lands and goods, which are worldly; what my mind is therein, and to whom I will and desire that the same shall remain after my decease, in such sort as by the laws of the realm I may, and, as I hope, shall not offend God, the giver of them all to me: considering, as it is in the Psalm, Cœlum cœli Domino, terram dedit filiis hominum; and, therefore, first, this 20th day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1579, and of Queen Elizabeth the 22d, I do revoke all my former wills in writing, which are many, and do mean that none shall, from this time forward, be of any force, but this now written, and that which shall from time to time be added hereunto."

As to the particulars of his will, as we have noticed the odd circumstance of two funerals, at great distance from each other, having, to all appearance, taken place on the same day, the following passages may, perhaps, help to explain the difficulties of the case.

"As for the burial of my body—because before the time of writing hereof, I have already caused a place in St. Martin's Church* in Stamford Baron, in the county of Northampton, wherein my house of Burleigh is situated, to be made fit for a burial-place for the bodies of my grandfather, father, and mother, and myself, and others that may succeed me; I do desire my executors, or such as I shall in this my will name, to take the charge of my burial, to cause my body to be buried there; otherwise I will leave it to be buried by their discretion, with the license of the Dean and Chapter, in the Collegiate Church of Westminster, near where the bodies of my wife and my daughter of Oxford are buried."

* The Vicarage of St. Martin's was endowed with the Rectorial tithes of the parish by his Lordship; who, in the year 1570, was also at the expense of rebuilding the town bridge at Stamford.

As he had caused a very stately monument to be erected to the memory of both these ladies, in the Abbey, and even written a very long Latin inscription for it, as we shall have to shew, it is very difficult to say what his own precise wishes might be when he gave so large a discretionary power to his trustees.

It is probable besides, that his executors might think, that though the family-vault at Stamford were the most suitable place for the reception of his body, yet that his high station and very eminent character might seem to require a more marked and public funeral than he had himself prescribed, in case he should be buried at Stamford: for the will proceeds—"And if my body shall be carried to be buried at Stamford Baron, I will that it be carried without any pomp, to my house of Burleigh, in some coach covered with black, accompanied only with twelve persons, and no more, whereof four to be gentlemen, and the rest yeomen and grooms, for avoiding of an unnecessary charge in a long carriage of a dead carcase; and that there be given forty shillings to every parish church for the poor where my corpse shall remain every night, until it shall be brought to my house of Burleigh, from whence it shall be decently carried to St. Martin's Church in Stamford."

The bequests in his will, particularly of plate, according to a certain specified number of ounces, to the several legatees, are very numerous. His estates he divided generally between his two sons, Sir Thomas and Sir Robert Cecil; assigning to the former such portions of his landed property in Northamptonshire, Rutlandshire, and Lincolnshire, as were most connected with Burghley;* and to the latter, his estates in Hertfordshire, Essex, and Middlesex, including Theobalds and Cheshunt Park. He provided handsomely for his three grandchildren by the Countess of Oxford, the Lady Elizabeth (Countess of Derby), and the Ladies Bridgett and Susan Vere; and concluded with certain gifts of charity to various parishes, and prisoners in the London jails, and donations to his servants; his two executors being Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, and his faithful servant, steward, and almoner (for so he may be justly called, from the many charities that passed through his hands), Mr. Thomas Bellott of Cheshunt.* And for overseers of the will (an appointment customary in those days), the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Keeper, and Justice Owen; giving to each of them a piece of gold plate to the weight of thirty ounces. As the whole will is extant in other books, particularly in Collins's edition of Lord Burghley's Life by a Domestic, we shall not think it necessary to transcribe it here; nor the account of his several estates, of which he died possessed, which Mr. Peck has printed in the first volume of his Desiderata Curiosa, Book v. No. xxix. It is entitled,

* Essendon [or Essingdon], in the county of Rutland, having been settled on the children of his second marriage, came to Sir Robert, whence he took his first title as a Peer, being created, May 13, 1603, Baron Cecil of Essendon, county Rutland. In securing this estate for ever to Sir Robert and his heirs, or the heirs of his sister Anne, Countess of Oxford, both born of Mildred Lady Burghley, he refers to its situation in the neighbourhood of the Burghley estates, willing it to be reserved by the heirs of his second marriage, as "a place to resorte unto, where my eldest son's livelihood doth lye, to continue familiaritie and acquaintance in blood betwixt them."—Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, vol. i. b. v. 191.

" A particular account of all such lands and other real estates as the Right Honourable William Lord Burghley, Lord Treasurer of England, &c. was possessed of at the time of his death, as the same was taken and returned upon inquisition, in Latin.

" Inquisitio indentata, capta apud Stamford in Comitatu Lincoln, 23° Aprilis, anno regni D. Elizabethe, D. G. Anglia, Francie, et Hibernie Regine, fidei defensoris, &c. 41°."

Then follow the names of the Commissioners, and of the several persons examined upon oath, as to particulars, which are exceedingly numerous, but of little interest to general readers; the inquisition concludes in these words,— " Et ulterius juratores predicti, super sacramentum suum predictum, dicunt, quod prenobilis Thomas Cecil, est filius et heres propinquior predicti Willielmi nuper D. Burghley, &c. et etatis quinquaginta sex annorum, et amplius, tempore mortis predicti W. nuper D. Burghley, &c.

" Et insuper,—Quod neque predictus Willielmus D. Burghley, nec aliquis alius, nec alii aliqui, ad ejus usum, habuit seu tenuit, habuerunt seu tenuerunt,

† This faithful servant, if I mistake not, lies buried within the rails of the Altar in Cheshunt Church. He was not only the distributor of Lord Burghley's charities and benefactions, but a benefactor himself, as may be seen by the following extract from a very curious account of the last sickness of the first Earl of Salisbury, written from Bath, 1612, by his Chaplain, Mr. John Bowles, afterwards Bishop of Rochester: " This day my Lord removed his lodging, and was desirous to see the great Church in Bath, where old Master [Thomas] Bellot [his father's steward and one of his executors] had bestowed some money of his father's, committed to his trust, and a great part likewise of his own substance. The Church he much liked, and the liberalities of such benefactors as had brought it to so good a perfection; adding, that he would himself bestow some good remembrance to the finishing thereof. And because old Mr. Bellot had spent all upon charitable uses, and left nothing for his kinsman, my Lord in the Church said, I give to my servant Bellot twenty pounds a-year during his natural life."

aliqua alia sive plura castra, dominia, manieria, mesuagia, terras, tenementa aut hereditamenta, in dicto com. Lincoln. seu alibi, in diminio, reversione, aut in servîtio, dîcto die quo obiit, aliter quam ut supra dictum est, ad eorum notitiam."

Of the several distinct estates or holdings, comprised under the descriptions above, of lands, messuages, manors, tenements, and hereditaments, the numbers returned upon the inquisition appear to have amounted to, as nearly as possible, *three hundred. We must not, however, suppose from this that his gains were exorbitant, or his fortune greater than his services had merited; for in proof of his having been neither miserable nor covetous, after speaking of his large expenses in buildings and charities, his Domestic observes, "all which great charges or expenses do prove he was neither covetous nor miserable; for to be covetous, is to desire more than he hath—but he might have had far more than he had, ergo he was not covetous; for where he had a shilling, he might have had a pound, if that vile humour had possessed him. And to be in so great favour of his Prince, so great a Counsellor in so great offices, so long time together, carrying the whole sway of the state, what wealth might he not have gathered if he had coveted to gather more? Are there not some with no office, small favour with the Prince, no countenance, and no credit in the Commonwealth, that have gathered more land, more money, and more wealth, than his Lordship left? Yes, many. Nay, I dare undertake, if some had his offices,

* Among the papers in the Museum, are many accounts in Lord Burghley's hand-writing relating to his estates, or the estates of his mother, their value, rents, and various other particulars. From some of these, it appears, that a portion of the rents was very commonly paid, not in money, but in corn of all kinds; straw, sheep, calves, rabbits, &c. There are also various letters from his agents in the country, giving account of planting or felling of woods, of the stock upon the estates, cows, sheep, horses; purchases and sales upon the farms, provision for the households and families, &c.; improvements in his gardens and pleasure grounds, and a multitude of other things, exceedingly curious to those who are fond of such researches, but not of importance enough to be introduced into a work of this nature. They all conspire, however, to shew the constant attention of this great Statesman, as well to all the details of his domestic concerns, as to the affairs of the nation; the only difficulty being to ascertain how it was possible for him to find time for such a multiplicity of business. For though it is well known that he employed many secretaries, yet those who are conversant with the contents of our public repositories of MSS., will know how continually the evidence of his own hand-writing occurs, in proof of his individual attention to the various subjects that seemed to call for his notice. We have before had occasion to observe, that many of his household accounts, and private memorandums, appear in Greek characters, as in his account of πλατε, we find ποττες 6 οφ σιλβερ—σπονες—κασιρ βοττελλ, πεπαρ βοξε—α κοβερδ κυππ gilt οφ δε qυεες gyft, &c.

place, and credit, but seven years, they would gain more in that time, than he did in forty years' painful service: covetousness is to desire all, and he might have had more than he desired, which proveth he coveted not so much; so likewise to be miserable, is he that can find in his heart to spend nothing; but I can prove he spent liberally, and therefore he could not be miserable. Look upon his huge expenses, and the truth will then shine out; he spent infinite sums in building, hospitality, and in maintenance of his honourable post; he gave 500*l.* a year to the poor; he spent more in entertainment of his Prince than any subject; he kept as fair a stable of horse as any nobleman; he made as costly gardens, walks, and places of pleasure, as are to be seen: put these and the like sums together, and then must his enemies confess, and his friends approve, he could never be miserable that could spend so liberally; for a miser will spend nothing." The author enters further into the particulars of his property, to shew that it was far from being exorbitantly great, comparatively, and observes, that upon Lord Oxford's great losses by profusion, he bought part of his lands, to give to his [Lord Oxford's] own daughter. As to his honourable courses, as the Queen's Treasurer, it is remarked, that "he would never pay a penny of the Queen's money without her warrant, nor ever borrowed or took any money out of the Exchequer for his own use, as many Treasurers had done; neither did he owe the Queen a penny when he died."

As we have had to notice the odd circumstance of two funerals having apparently taken place on the same day, so as to puzzle some persons as to the actual interment of the remains of the great man whose life we have been writing, we have now to notice two inscriptions commemorative of his name and family, one at Stamford, and the other in Westminster Abbey. As the probability is, that during the celebration of his funeral in the latter Cathedral, his body was secretly conveyed to Stamford, and there buried amongst his ancestors, we shall first transcribe what is to be found on his monument in that place.

"Deo. opt. maximo et memoriæ sacrum honoratissimus et longè clarissimus D. Gulielmus Cecilius, Baro de Burgleigh, summus Angliæ Thesaurarius, curiæ pupillorum præfectus, Georgiani ordinis eques auratus; serenissimæ Elizabethæ Angliæ, &c. Reginæ, à sanctioribus Consiliis, et Academiæ Cantabrigiensis Cancellarius, sub hoc tumulo, secundum Christi adventum manet.

"Uxores habuit duas; MARIAM sororem Johannis CHEEKE equitis aurati; e qua genuit filium unicum THOMAM nunc Baronem de BURGHLEY, et MILDREDAM filiam Antonii COOKE equitis aurati, quæ illi peperit ROBERTUM CECILIUM equitem auratum Reginæ Elizabethæ à secretis, et curiæ præfectum. ANNAM enuptam Edwardo Comiti Oxoniæ; et ELIZABETHAM Gulielmo Wentworth filio primogenito Baronis Wentworth."—The mention of his Lordship's two marriages in this inscription, and of his two sons by those marriages, who became severally the heads of the present most noble houses of Salisbury and Exeter, induces us to pass the prescribed limits of this memoir so far, as to notice the rather extraordinary circumstances of the elevation of both the brothers to the rank of Earls. Sir Thomas Cecil, the issue of the first marriage, succeeded of course to the Barony of Burghley on the death of his father, 1598. In May 1603, Sir Robert Cecil, being then Secretary of State, was created Baron Cecil of Essingdon, and in August 1604, Viscount Cranborne, thereby obtaining rank above his brother; but, as it would seem, not by his own desire, as a letter, still in existence, from the second Lord Burghley to the King's Attorney-General, plainly shews than an offer was made to the latter of an advancement in the Peerage, before his brother was even made a Baron. The letter is on many accounts curious.

" Sir John Hubbert,

" Your letters found me in such estate, as rather I desired three days' ease of pain, than to delight to think of any title of honour.

" I am resolved to content myself with this estate I have of a baron; and my present estate of living, howsoever those of the world have enlarged it, I find little enough to maintain the degree I am in, and I am sure they that succeed me will be less able to maintain it than I am, considering there will go out of the baronage three younger brothers' livings.

" This is all I can write to you at this time, being full of pain; and therefore you must be content with this my brief writing. And I give you my hearty thanks for your good wishes, and think myself beholden to those my friends that had care of me therein. And so I rest your assured friend,

" THOMAS BURGHLEY."

" Burleigh, this 12th of January, 1603."

In this letter the different way of spelling Burghley is very noticeable, though consistent with the customs of those days. We have shewn, in our first volume, upon what authority we have constantly adopted the spelling in our title-page.

It seems evident from the above account, that it was with Lord Burghley's own choice and consent that his brother was advanced before him in the Peerage, and even at last, an Earldom appears to have been almost forced upon the former, to keep him at least in the same degree of nobility as his brother; for on the very day that Lord Cranborne was made Earl of Salisbury, Lord Burghley was made Earl of Exeter, the latter Peerage bearing date but a few hours after the former. Collins seems to think it was an Earldom that was offered to Lord Burghley in 1603; but his Lordship had a large family,* and it is impossible not to admire the firmness with which he seems to have resisted his own advancement, without wishing to impede that of his brother.

The other inscription, said to be written by Lord Burghley himself, soon after the deaths of the Countess of Oxford and his own Lady,† may require some previous description of the monument to which it applies; especially as it may serve as almost a regular English version of the inscription itself. The following therefore we copy from a printed history of "The Antiquities of St. Peter's, or the Abbey Church of Westminster, in two volumes, 1722."

"Next to this, but a little more toward the south-east angle of this Chapel, you behold against the wall a most noble monument, 24 foot high, with divers arches and canopies, supported by pillars of the Corinthian order, and adorned with pyramids of porphyry, Touch, Lydian, and various coloured marble, most curiously carved, and gilt with gold. On the upper part of this monument, you see, under a neat arch, a small image of an ancient man on his knees, in his robes of state, with a collar and jewel of the Order of St. George about his neck, being the statue of WILLIAM CECILL Lord BURLEIGH, Lord High Treasurer of England, Privy Counsellor to Queen Elizabeth, and Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, who erected this stately tomb to the memory of his wife and daughter. Their statues are to be seen at full length, in a cumbent posture, in their robes of the finest alabaster, on the pedestal; the farthermost representing MILDRED, the Lady BURLEIGH, wife of the beforesaid WILLIAM CECILL. She was daughter to Sir Anthony Coke, Knight, by Anne, the daughter of Sir William Fitzwilliam, Knight, and no less eminent for her extraordinary charity and piety, than for her uncommon learning; for she not only endowed several Colleges in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, with certain annual revenues, but also bestowed every month considerable gifts upon the poor, in several parts of the country, and supplied necessitous tradesmen with money to carry on their business: besides this, she was well versed in the Latin, and still more in the Greek tongue, taking great delight in reading the works of Basil the Great, Chrysostome, Gregory of Nazianzen, and such like.

"She was married in the twentieth year of her age to the before-mentioned WILLIAM CECILL, Anno 1545, and lived with him no less than forty-three years, during which time she bore him a numerous stock of children, who died very young, except two daughters, viz. ANNE and ELIZABETH, and one son named ROBERT CECILL, who not long before her death married Elizabeth Brooke, the daughter of the Lord Cobham. She died in the sixty-third year of her age, the fourth day of April, 1589.

"The other statue on the hithermost side represents the Lady ANNE her daughter, who was married in the fifteenth year of her age to Edward Vere, the seventeenth Earl of Oxford of that name, and Lord High Chamberlain of England; by whom she had many children, but left only three daughters behind her, viz. Elizabeth at fourteen, and Bridget at five years of age: Susanna, the third, being only an infant at the time of her death, which happened about a year before that of her mother, viz. Anno 1588, at the Royal Palace at Greenwich. At the head of the pedestal of this tomb, is a canopy supported by small columns of the Corinthian order, and painted with azure, and another of the same make and material at the feet; underneath each of which is a death's-head inclosed in chrystal, with these words, MORS JANUA VITÆ; and MORS MIHI LUCRUM. At the feet of the Lady Mildred and her daughter Anne, you behold three small female figures kneeling, representing the before-mentioned Lady Elizabeth, the Lady Bridget and the Lady *Anne Vere, daughters to Anne Countess of Oxford; and at the feet, a statue of a youth kneeling, representing Robert Cecill, son of the above-mentioned William Cecill, and the Lady Mildred his wife, as may be seen more at large by the inscription in Latin," which, as reported to be the composition of the Lord Treasurer himself, ought not to be omitted; but, as it contains many repetitions, we shall inclose it within brackets, that those who wish to pass it over, may consider it as rather supplementary than a proper portion of the text, though if actually written by Lord Burghley, well calculated to do honour to his private feelings, as a most affectionate husband, a fond father, and a pious Christian.

Having thus given an account of the last illness, the death, burial, and will; character, public and private; family and fortune, of the great LORD BURGHLEY, as he was very justly called, with the sepulchral and monumental inscriptions designed to perpetuate his memory and fame to after generations, we cannot do better than conclude, with the following feeling remarks of the author from whom the world in general has derived most of the information contained in the present chapter, and who thus pathetically dwells upon the effects produced by the death of his honoured and much revered LORD: " This was a happy day to himself, though doleful to his country; now might one see all the world mourning; the Queen, for an old, true, and loyal servant; the Council for a wise and grave counsellor; the Court for their honourable benefactor; his Country and commonwealth trembling, as it were, at one blow to have their head stricken off; the people, widows, and wards lamenting to lose their protector; Religion, her patron; Justice, her true minister; and Peace her upholder; his children bewailing the loss of such a father, his friends of such a friend, and his servants of such a master; all men rather bewailing his loss, than hoping ever to find such another. Yea, his very enemies, who in his life time could not abide him, do now both sorrow for his death, and wish him alive again; but, alas! let no man grieve at his death; for it was greater happiness to himself, than loss to others; for his life was continually in care of mind, labour, pains of body, and vexation of spirit; but now is his MIND at quiet, his BODY at rest, and his SPIRIT in JOY!"

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.

No. I.

In vol. i. p. 15, notice has been taken of a MS. in the possession of the Marquess of Salisbury, purporting to be an account of a family in Burgundy of the name of Cecile, claiming affinity with the Cecils of the houses of Burghley and Salisbury, in the year 1679. The account being of some curiosity in itself, though failing, as we think, to prove the presumed affinity, we have thought it not amiss to give it a place in our Appendix.

It speaks of a family long settled in the village of Frâsne, in Franche Comte, in Burgundy, of the name of Cecile, commonly called les bons Ceciles; not in contradiction to any others of the name, but absolutely, and as matter of particular praise and honour, one of the family, Eugene Cecile, Lord of Vaudhaon, being living in 1679, the date of the memoir. It asserts that the family had been for four centuries settled in the place, in occupation of a stately family mansion, still to be traced in the ruins of what the inhabitants were accustomed to call the Castle.

That the family of Cecile enjoyed very peculiar privileges there, their lands being exempt from all customary payments to the superior Lord of the place (the Prince of Orange); an exemption not confined merely to lands in immediate possession, but equally applicable to all they might obtain by purchase, inasmuch as to induce the Princes of the House of Orange, at all times, to interpose as far as might be in their power, to limit and restrain the amount of such acquisitions, so much to their own loss and damage.

That, forbearing to go minutely into the history of the family from the earliest times, it was certain that in the year 1400 there lived in the said village of Frâsne a William Cecile.

That the wealth of this ancestor was such, as to admit of his advancing great loans of money to the Prince of Orange, in requital of which, notwithstanding the jealousies and restrictions spoken of above, he was able to add to his former possessions, a considerable portion of forest land, belonging originally to the same Prince, and adjoining to lands previously in his possession; and that the whole together had ever since obtained and kept the name of La Joux (autrement la forest) Cecile.

This William Cecile is stated to have married a lady of good family (tres cavaliere) of the name of Beaurepair, by whom he had issue; one son being called David Cecile.

Which David Cecile, at the time that the armies of England and Burgundy, under Henry V. and Duke Philip the Good, fought against France (about the year 1421), joined himself to the English armies, and passed into England in the service and household of Henry VI., after that Prince had been crowned King of France.

From this David Cecile, the first of his family, settled and established in England, descended, being his grandson, William Cecile, a great statesman and minister under Queen Elizabeth.

Whose great grandson, the Earl of Salisbury, is now living in England, in great splendour and prosperity.

That the departure of the said David Cecile from his native country to settle in England, at the time and upon the occasion before mentioned, has always been traditionally recorded and acknowledged by the several branches of the Burgundian family, and entered in their genealogical tables and registers.

That the identity of the English and Burgundian names, Cecile "ortografiè sans plus, ny moins des ces six caractères, (consonantes et voyelles)" proves it to have been originally, from the very spelling and pronunciation, not an English, but a French name; and that in no province of France, excepting Burgundy, is there to be found another family of that name. The English family may therefore be concluded to have descended from that of Burgundy.

That the former cannot, to any certainty, carry back the æra of their residence in England, beyond the year 1440;* whereas the latter have documents to prove their residence in Burgundy from the year 1300.

That many travellers from Burgundy have asserted, that in England the family of Cecile is judged to be of foreign extraction.

And from the report of such travellers it is, that the Burgundian families have collected their knowledge of the success and prosperity of the descendants of the great minister, William Cecile.

* Query,—Is not this evidently contradicted by what is previously said of David Cecile passing into England in 1421 ?

The account then proceeds to the descendants of Hugh Cecile, the brother of David Cecile, the first who passed into England.

Hugh having married a lady allied to the Lords of Chasteavert, had a son named John, the ancestor of a branch of the family, settled at Pontarlier, which family divided again into many branches, of which it is not necessary to take any account, except that they are described to have been, for many generations, well endowed, of good reputation, and great military talents. One of the descendants, about the year 1550, appears to have been appointed the King's Treasurer for the province of Burgundy, a post always bestowed on persons of wealth and importance, and which he held all his life, and therefore, at the very time, says the memorialist (si parva licet componere magnis), that the great WILLIAM CECIL of England was Lord Treasurer to Queen Elizabeth.

One branch of the Burgundian family is reported to have settled at Salins, and to have become so attached to the military profession, as to have been all soldiers, serving under Charles V., Don John of Austria, and other Princes of that house, one of the race having particularly distinguished himself under the Duke of Savoy, at the time that Thomas and John [Robert] Cecile, of the English branch, equally distinguished themselves in the defence of England, from the Armada of Philip II., of which the Burgundian family had information.

That the revenues of the different branches of the family had been much dissipated, by passing through females into other families, though there had not been wanting also means of augmenting the same, by fortunate and honourable marriages. Their gentility was regularly proved, signed and sealed, and entered into the registers of Malta, before certain noble commissioners of the province of Burgundy, in the year 1675, to enable one of the family to become a Knight of Santiago.

Many honourable houses are stated to have descended from the married females of the family, the names of whom, with collateral alliances, are duly noticed.

In 1679, the very year in which the memorial appears to have been drawn up, a branch of the family is said to have been settled in Spain, and in good reputation there.

The memorial concludes with commendations of the Heir Presumptive of the Burgundian family, a youth of fifteen, highly accomplished, and who looked forward with pleasure to the honour some time or other of paying his respects to MONSIEUR LE COMTE de SALISBURY. This, indeed, seems to explain the the whole MS., on the outside of which is written as follows: "Papier et genealogiè, a devoir estre presentè, et mis en mains de Monsieur le Comte de Salisbury, chef de la maison des Seigneurs CECILE d'Angleterre, lequel Seigneur Comte est supplié de vouloir s'en faire faire la lecture."

The arms of the family, in the blazonry of France, are thus described:

De gueule, a trois bandes d'argent de droîte à gauche. These are said to be very ancient, and to be found in the windows and on the tombs in the churches of Frâsne and Bourg de la Riviere. The crest is stated to be the head and neck of an unicorn issuing out of a crown; the latter granted by the sovereigns of Austria, "in signum, et præmium Valoris." The supporters, Mars and Minerva, with the device, "Et mente utaris et ense."

N. B.—Claims of relationship to great families in England, on the part of foreigners, bearing names of a like sound or spelling, appear to have been not uncommon in the sixteenth century. In the year 1586, appeared a work called Lacye's Nobility, by J. Ferne, of the Inner Temple; written, as it is said, to disprove the claim of affinity to the noble race of the Lacyes, Earls of Lincoln, which had been made by Albertus à Lasco, Count Palatine of Syradia in Poland, and which in the above work is stated to have been very successfully refuted.—See Moule's Bibliotheca Heraldica, No. xxxiv.

Though there might be weighty reasons for the refuting such claims when not well founded, we cannot help remarking, that in both the above instances, the claimants appear to have been of great respectability; though such claims probably would never have been thought of, but for the honour and advantage likely to ensue, from the acknowledgment and admission of them by the English families.

Having disposed of the above rather curious document, and more fully to shew the correctness of the account given of the family in volume i. pp. 10, 11, I shall subjoin the following extract from a letter to that eminent antiquary Edmund Turnor, Esq. by John Charles Brooke, Esq. Somerset Herald, written when on a visit to the Duke of Norfolk, at Holm Lacey, within twenty miles of Alterennis in the County of Hereford, 1781, very obligingly communicated to me by Mr. Turnor himself.

"As the heir-general of one branch of the family, I must inform you that the Cecils still continue at Alterennis in this County, where they have remained ever since the Conquest. They are the elder branch of the Exeter and Salisbury families; David their ancestor being a younger son of the house of Alterennis. The Estate has descended without much addition or diminution to the present heir."

No. II.

Ten Precepts which William Lord Burghley, Lord High Treasurer of England, gave to his second son, Robert Cecil, afterwards the Earl of Salisbury.*

"Son Robert,

"The virtuous inclinations of thy matchless mother, by whose tender and godly care thy infancy was governed, together with thy education under so zealous and excellent a tutor, puts me in rather assurance than hope, that thou art not ignorant of that summum bonum, which is only able to make thee happy as well in thy death as life; I mean the true knowledge and worship of thy Creator and Redeemer; without which all other things are vain and miserable. so that thy youth being guided by so sufficient a teacher, I make no doubt but he will furnish thy life with divine and moral documents; yet that I may not cast off the care beseeming a parent towards his child; or that you should have cause to derive thy whole felicity and welfare rather from others than from whence thou receivedst thy breath and being; I think it fit and agreeable to the affection I bear thee, to help thee with such rules and advertisements for the squaring of thy life, as are rather gained by experience, than much reading; to the end that entering into this exorbitant age, thou mayest be the better prepared to shunne those scandalous courses whereunto the world and the lack of experience may easily draw thee. And because I will not confound thy memory, I have reduced them into ten precepts; and next unto Moses' tables, if thou imprint them in thy mind, thou shalt reap the benefit, and I the content; and they are these following:—

* Though this advice of Lord Burghley to his son, is to be found in many other books, it must be admitted to belong, most properly, to a work purporting to be a history of the life of that great man; we should expect to be more blamed for its omission, than for its introduction in this place, however generally known before.

I.

"When it shall please God to bring thee to man's estate, use great providence and circumspection in chusing thy wife; for from thence will spring all thy future good or evil; and it is an action of life, like unto a stratagem of warre, wherein a man can err but once. If thy estate be good, match neere home and at leisure; if weak, far off and quickly. Enquire diligently of her disposition, and how her parents have been inclined in their youth; let her not be poore, how generous soever; for a man can buy nothing in the market with gentility; nor chuse a base and uncomely creature altogether for wealth; for it will cause contempt in others and loathing in thee; neither make choice of a dwarfe, or a fool; for by the one you shall beget a race of pigmies, the other will be thy continual disgrace, and it will yirke thee to hear her talk; for thou shalt find it, to thy great grief, that there is nothing more fulsome than a she-foole.

"And touching the guiding of thy house, let thy hospitality be moderate, and according to the means of thy estate, rather plentiful than sparing, but not costly; for I never knew any man grow poor by keeping an orderly table; but some consume themselves through secret vices, and their hospitalitie bears the blame; but banish swinish drunkards out of thine house, which is a vice impairing health, consuming much, and makes no show. I never heard praise ascribed to the drunkard, but for the well bearing of his drink, which is better commendation for a brewer's horse or a dray man, then for either a gentleman, or a serving man. Beware thou spend not above three or four parts of thy revenues; nor above a third part of that in thy house; for the other two parts will do no more than defray thy extraordinaries, which always surmount the ordinary by much: otherwise thou shalt live like a rich beggar, in continual want: and the needy man can never live happily or contentedly; for every disaster makes him ready to mortgage or sell; and that gentleman who sells an acre of land, sells an ounce of credit, for gentility is nothing else but ancient riches; so that if the foundation shall at any time sinke, the building must need follow.—So much for the first precept.

II.

"Bring thy children up in learning and obedience, yet without outward austerity. Praise them openly, reprehend them secretly. Give them good countenance and convenient maintenance according to thy ability, otherwise thy life will seem their bondage, and what portion thou shalt leave them at thy death, they will thank death for it, and not thee. And I am persuaded that the foolish cockering of some parents, and the overstern carriage of others, causeth more men and women to take ill courses, than their own vicious inclinations. Marry thy daughters in time, lest they marry themselves.* And suffer not thy sonnes to pass the Alps, for they shall learn nothing there but pride, blasphemy, and atheism. And if by travel they get a few broken languages, that shall profit them nothing more than to have one meat served in divers dishes. Neither, by my consent, shalt thou train them up in warres; for he that sets up his rest to live by that profession, can hardly be an honest man or a good Christian; besides it is a science no longer in request than use; for souldiers in peace, are like chimneys in summer."

III.

"Live not in the country without corn and cattle about thee; for he that putteth his hand to the purse for every expense of household, is like him that keepeth water in a sieve. And what provision thou shalt want, learn to buy it at the best hand; for there is one penny saved in four, betwixt buying in thy need, and when the markets and seasons serve fittest for it. Be not served with kinsmen, or friends, or men intreated to stay; for they expect much and doe little; nor with such as are amorous, for their heads are intoxicated. And keep rather two too few, than one too many. Feed them well, and pay them with the most; and then thou mayst boldly require service at their hands."

* It may be questioned whether Lord Burghley did not fall into some mistake on this point of marrying his daughters early. His favourite daughter, Lady Oxford, whose marriage was a very unfortunate one, appears to have been only fifteen years old, when wedded to Lord Oxford. The very next passage in the precept appears clearly to have alluded to that accomplished but wayward Lord.

IV.

"Let thy kindred and allies be welcome to thy house and table; grace them with thy countenance, and farther them in all honest actions; for by this means, thou shalt so double the bond of nature, as thou shalt find them so many advocates to plead an apology for thee behind thy back; but shake off those glow-worms, I mean parasites and sycophants, who will feed and fawn upon thee in the summer of prosperitie, but in adverse storme, they will shelter thee no more than an harbour in winter."

V.

"Beware of suretyship for thy best friends; he that payeth another man's debts, seeketh his own decay; but if thou canst not otherwise chuse, rather lend thy money thyself upon good bonds, although thou borrow it; so shalt thou secure thyself, and pleasure thy friend; neither borrow money of a neighbour or a friend, but of a stranger, where paying it, thou shalt hear no more of it, otherwise thou shalt eclipse thy credit, lose thy freedom, and yet pay as dear as to another. But in borrowing of money be precious of thy word, for he that hath care of keeping dayes of payment, is Lord of another man's purse."

VI.

"Undertake no suit against a poor man without receiving much wrong; for besides that thou makest him thy compeer, it is a base conquest to triumph where there is small resistance; neither attempt law against any man before thou be fully resolved that thou hast right on thy side; and then spare not for either money or paines; for a cause or two so followed and obtained, will free thee from suits a great part of thy life."

"Be sure to keep some great man thy friend, but trouble him not with trifles; compliment him often with many, yet small gifts,* and of little charge;

* In Aikin's Court of Elizabeth, some judicious remarks occur upon this precept, as indicative of the venality of the times; and it certainly cannot be denied, that, though the Lord Treasurer himself was not to be worked upon by gifts and gratuities, there were always those about the Court who could be no otherwise conciliated, or moved to do what was right.

and if thou hast cause to bestow any great gratuity, let it be something which may be daily in sight; otherwise in this ambitious age, thou shalt remaine like a hop without a pole; live in obscurity, and be made a football for every insulting companion to spurn at."

VIII.

"Towards thy superiors be humble, yet generous; with thine equals familiar, yet respective; towards thine inferiors shew much humanity, and some familiarity; as to bow the body, stretch forth the hand, and to uncover the head, with such like popular compliments. The first prepares thy way to advancement, the second makes thee known for a man well bred, the third gains a good report, which once got is easily kept; for right humanity takes such deep root in the minds of the multitude, as they are easilier gained by unprofitable curtesies, than by churlish benefits; yet I advise thee not to affect or neglect popularitie too much; seeke not to be Essex; shunne to be Rawleigh."

IX.

"Trust not any man with thy life, credit, or estate; for it is mere folly for a man to enthrall himself to his friend, as though, occasion being offered, he should not dare to become his enemy."

X.

"Be not scurrilous in conversation nor satyricall in thy jests: the one will make thee unwelcome to all company, the other pull on quarrells, and get thee hatred of thy best friends; for suspitious jests, when any of them savour of truth, leave a bitterness in the mindes of those which are touched; and, albeit, I have already pointed at this inclusively, yet I think it necessary to leave it to thee as a special caution; because I have seen many so prone to quip and gird, as they would rather leese their friend than their jest; and if, perchance, their boiling braine yield a quaint scoff, they will travel to be delivered of it as a woman with child. These nimble fancies are but the froth of wit."

To the above may be added, a certain set of Maxims or Sayings attributed to his Lordship by his domestic historian.

1. "He would usually say, in all things, Primum quærite regnum Cælorum. Seek ye first the kingdom of God."

2. "That honesty and religion were the grounds and ends of all good men's actions, which otherwise would not prosper."

3. "That he built more upon an honest man's word than a bad man's bond."

4. "That he would never trust any man who was not a man of sound conscience: for he who was false to God, could never be true to man."

5. "That no man can be counted happy in this world that is not wise; and he that is wisest, seeth most of his own unhappiness."

6. "That all things, as it is said, are written for our instruction; and yet many turn to our destruction."

7. "That that nation was happy, where the King would take counsel and follow it."

8. "That that King was happy that loved the people, and they loved the King."

9. "That the strength of a King is the love of his subjects."

10. "That Princes ought to be better than other men, because they command and rule all others."

11. "That a good Prince must hear all, but strive to follow the best counsel."

12. "That he is a happy King, who can govern and moderate his affections."

13. "That no wise Prince can be a tyrant."

14. "That a good Prince is slow to anger."

15. "That Princes have many eyes and ears, and very long arms: for they hear and see all, reach far, and gripe much."

16. "That good Princes ought first to prefer the service of God, and his Church; and next of all the Commonwealth, before their own pleasure or profit."

17. "That he can never be a good statesman who respecteth not the public more than his own private advantage."

18. "That honour is the reward of virtue, but is gotten with labour, and held with danger."

19. "That counsel without resolution and execution was but wind."

20. "That division in counsel was dangerous, if not a subversion of the State."

21. " That attempts are most probable, being wisely plotted, secretly carried, and speedily executed."

22. " That unity is the strength, and division the ruin of any body politic."

23. " That the taking or neglecting of an opportunity was the gaining or losing of great fortunes."

24. "' He ever said of danger, that our enemies shall do no more than God will suffer them."

25. " That war is soon kindled, but peace very hardly procured."

26. " That war is the curse, and peace the blessing of God, upon a nation."

27. " That a realm gaineth more by one year's peace, than ten years' war."

28. " That a realm cannot be rich, that hath not an intercourse and trade of merchandize with other nations."

29. " That no man can get riches of himself, but by means of others."

30. " That riches were God's blessing, to such as use them well; and his curse to such as do not."

31. " That he seldom saw goods ill gotten, but they were quickly ill spent."

32. " That all things in this world are valuable but in estimation; for a little, to him that thinketh it enough, is great riches."

33. " That private gain is the perverting of justice and the pestilence of a commonwealth."

34. " That the unthrifty looseness of youth, in this age, was the parent's fault, who made them men seven years too soon, having but children's judgment."

35. " He would often say that he thought there was never so wise a woman born, for all respects, as Queen Elizabeth."

36. " For she spake and understood all languages."

37. " Knew all estates, and dispositions of all Princes; and, particularly, was so expert in the knowledge of her realm and estate, as no counsellor she had could tell her what she knew not before."

38. " She had also so rare gifts, as when her counsellors had said all they could say, she would then frame out a wise counsel beyond theirs."

39. " That she often shewed her wisdom and care of her country: for there was never any great consultation, but she would be present herself, to her great profit and praise."

His Motto was—" Cor unum, via una."
His Saying—" Prudens qui patiens."
His Maxim—" Nolo, minor me timeat, despiceatve major."

Among the odd conceits, in Camden's Remains, we find, under the head of anagrams, the following: " For the late Lord Treasurer, a most prudent and honourable Counsellor to two mighty Princes."

Gulielmus Cecilius Baro Burglio
VIGILI CUM LABORE ILLUCES REGIBUS
Regibus illuces vigili Gulielme labore, Nam clarè fulget lux tua luce Dei.

As it comes from a contemporary, we have not hesitated to copy it; but we apprehend that modern anagrammatists may reasonably question its merits and exactness, in its present state; but we shall venture to suggest Burghleii, instead of Burglio, as printed in Camden, Edit. 1657.
